noble and magnificent surroundings, and whichever way you journey a wide and splendid country appears. Sherwood forest, now no more, except in patches, once waved its endless branches from this vicinity to Nottingham. A cultivated land takes the place of the "boundless contiguity of shade." The harvest field shines, and the elegant dwelling. I only have the opportunity to enjoy one drive, and that is to Chatsworth Hall, the home of the Duke of Devonshire. This is about twelve miles from Sheffield. On Monday we set forth, a somewhat cloudy day, but now and then the sunshine bursts forth in brilliant glory, and all the distant heights catch the changing luster, and a scene of enchanting variety is presented. We travel over immense hills. There are no sharp ascents here. It is mostly like a vast table land, teeming with harvest, while yet the moorlands offer a bare and solitary appearance, so that we see nature in majestic contrast. The scene on every side is ample. As we roll alongside Froggatt Edge one of the most lovely and stupendous landscapes in the world unfolds from the valley beneath to the mountainous horizon. Embosomed in the valley, hundreds of feet below your flying vehicle, is a charming ancient village, over which hovers the atmosphere of golden romance. The valley, rich with fields and groves, opens and spreads away in gorgeous loveliness, while the shining river Derwent, celebrated in song, like a ribbon ornaments the long extending prospect. Above the valley stretch the vast hills in somber columns, edged with wild precipitous rocks and dusky forest. On the side whence we view this resplendent panorama the walls seem to go sheer down to the valley itself. Almost from our very feet and the banks of the luminous river, swells above and beyond the village, that hangs like a jewel on the scene, the enormous height, whose verdant fields sink into desolate spaces.

From this attractive point we sweep on to the great hall, around which are so many memories of the past. Passing through the delightful park, where the deer are grazing, we see Queen Mary's Bower, a lovely island, and yet a prison for the imperious queen, where her heart must have poured itself out in useless lamentations. Here she could enjoy the sunshine and the flowers, look upon the bright, blue sky, but round about her rolled the relentless waters, and there was no escape. Beautiful were the scenes she gazed upon in her captivity, the great hall, in the midst of massiv foliage, where royalty was wont to spend its hours of luxury. Within its spacious rooms are some of the finest pictures and statues in England, rare china and porcelain and treasures of the olden time. The garden attached is a marvelous profusion of riches, pomp of color, with fountains and glades and cataracts in the gloom of wood and steep. The hot-house is the largest in the kingdom. It has taken the painters three years to re-decorate the roof and sides. It shines with tropical splendor. Alas for the fortunes of the day! just as we left this luxurious abode, to see new curiosities, a sudden shower descended upon our troop, and we were obliged to find refuge wherever we could, for the stately footman had forbidden the use of umbrellas while in these palatial regions, and so we had to dive under the bushes, and it was a somewhat disconsolate scene for about ten minutes, the rain pouring in torrents. Well, we were repaid for the momentary discomfort. After the shower the sun came out more gorgeously than ever, and the afternoon was simply superb. Everything was fresh and glittering. We visited the church and churchyard, where is buried Lord Frederick Cavendish, who was murdered at Phoenix Park. It is a quiet place, surrounded with a model village. If one might find, outwardly, a paradise on earth it would be on this spot, where everything seems so harmonious. All the dwelling-houses have a supreme aspect of utility and elegance. But I suppose I should get tired of such a comfortable existence in about a day's time, and should want to fly off to the turmoil of London. There is such a thing as life flowing along so smoothly that death would be welcomed as a change. However, these placid scenes remain in the memory with a charming and romantic perspective, and we dream of these mild resting-places when "life's fitful fever" is over. Amidst the glory of the descending sun we return homeward, climbing great hills and plunging into deep valleys, with the moon in queenly luster along the radiant heavens, and then the innumerable lights of Sheffield, as we drive into its smoky and resounding realms, and one more beautiful picture is added to the gallery of memory.

I enjoyed my work in Sheffield. There are sturdy workers here. Mr. Nelson, Mr. Lill, and others too numerous to mention, gathered on this old-time battle-field. There was a noble delegation from Barnesley. They walked in, a distance of about sixteen miles. I was presented by these comrades with a photograph of the soldiers at this point, while on campaign duty, Mr. and Mrs. Addy, Mr. Bennett, Mr. Dyson, who occupies the lecturer's desk, and is one of our busy workers; Harry Addy, young, but ready to do his duty; Mr. Wombwell, and Mr. and Mrs. Wadmore. I thank these friends for their handsome gift. We all had tea together at the hall in the afternoon, and this enabled me to make acquaintance with the Freethinkers of Sheffield and vicinity, and it was a most enjoyable occasion. I gave three lectures that day, morning, afternoon, and evening. The attendance was fair, considering that we are the frontier force, and the enthusiastic welcome was cheering to the heart of the Pilgrim. I was glad to greet new friends from near and far, and to place their names and features upon the tablets of memory, but if I began to enumerate I should not know where to end, for the friends of our cause rally by the score. But Sheffield Secularism will continue to hold the fort for many years to come, as it has already held the fort for half a century.

Yes, Sheffield has, I think, the oldest Free-thought hall in England, and perhaps in the world. It was built over fifty years ago, especially for Secular and reform purposes, and it has been kept to the original aim through many changing fortunes, and I felt that it was an honor to speak in a building so consecrated by human genius. Owen, Holyoake, Bradlaugh, Annie Besant in her palmy days, Foote, Watts, and many other stalwart defenders of liberty, have spoken from the platform. Therefore, we might say that here in this time-worn building is the oldest battle-ground of English Secularism, an unpretentious building, but mighty in the thoughts that have glowed and thundered within its walls. Sheffield gives a priceless inheritance to the struggle of to-day from the dark yet glorious fields of the past.

I had the great pleasure, while staying at Sheffield, of enjoying the hospitality of American friends, Mr. and Mrs. J. E. Matthewson, formerly of Philadelphia. They have been in England for over twenty years, but they were born beneath the Stars and Stripes, and have not lost the love of nativland. They gave me a delightful welcome, and the hours sped merrily along, the glories of England mingling with reminiscences of the great Republic of the West—not that we love England less, but that we love America more, because in America we were born, and the homeliest spot is rich and beautiful because in it we first saw the light of day, the tenderness of human love mingling with the wonder and delight of nature. Mr. Matthewson is a true-blue, go-ahead American citizen. He is an inventor and a business man, and he has built a great factory in Sheffield, and his trade extends to all the world. We are constantly learning something new, and the "sand-blast" is something new to me. And it is a wonderful power. Remarkable it is that human ingenuity never discovered what sand could do until within a few years. Gen. B. C. Tilghman is the original inventor, and Mr. Matthewson has added many patents, so that now the "sand-blast" has become a marvelous instrumentality. It is not only a worker, but an artist. It can produce in glass the most beautiful results, and the whirling sand-particles become as cunning as the human hand. They chisel with wondrous rapidity, a million of them working in harmonious combinations.

Professor Tyndall has eloquently described the "sand-blast," and it is worthy of note, so beautiful and so extraordinary is the process. Professor Tyndall says: "The Sphinx of Egypt is nearly covered up by the sand of the desert. The neck of the Sphinx is partly cut across by the eroding action of the fine sand blown against it. This action of sand has recently been turned to extraordinary account in the United States. When in Boston I was taken by Mr. Josiah Quincy to see the action of the 'sand-blast.' A kind of hopper containing fine silicious sand was connected with a reservoir of compressed air. The hopper ended in a long slit, from whence the sand was blown. A plate-glass was placed beneath this slit and caused to pass slowly under it. It came out perfectly depolished, with a bright, opalescent glimmer, such as could be produced only by the most careful grinding. But this was not all. By protecting certain portions of the glass and exposing others, figures and traceries of any required form could be etched upon the glass." Perhaps from this brief description one can catch some idea of the variable potency of the "sand-blast." For ages it had been working away upon the Sphinx, upon the stones of the desert, and yet no one had ever utilized this "sand-power" until the invention and patents of General Tilghman and Mr. Matthewson, and now it is world-wide in its uses. All the files of Sheffield are sharpened by the "sand-blast." Glass is polished by it, and all kinds of figures, the most beautiful possible, can be cut in glass. Also tombstones are engraved by the same process. What was once done by hand is now done by the "sand-blast." The sand can cut into the hardest substances, for it is the concentrated energy of millions of particles of sand that does the work. Sand is also used for cleaning purposes. It is better than water. The fine sand, whirling from a tube, will knock the dirt out in no time. It will clean a building as no human hand could possibly do. It will thus be seen what a manifold power has been developed by the skill and perseverance of Mr. Matthewson, whose inventions must certainly take a front rank with the glories of modern industry. Mr. Frederick Matthewson, his son, is also devoted to this important enterprise. Miss Charlotte Matthewson, the daughter, is a member of the Royal College of Music, an honor which but few, comparatively attain, and she is an exquisite player upon the violin, attesting the genius of woman and her capacity to do anything that man can do, give her a chance. So, mingling with the arts and industry of Sheffield, were the delights of music. I visited also the gallery and museum in the park, and here are many valuable paintings, also curiosities for the scientific. Near Sheffield is Queen Mary's Tower, where she was for some time incarcerated by the Earl of Shrewsbury. On the last night of my stay, Wednesday, I went to hear a lecture on new developments of steam power, and here I learned something I did not know before about steam. I suppose that engineers will understand me when I write of "superheating steam." That was a new phrase to me. In this, however, is one of the gigantic problems of the age. Its solution means a vast increase of steam energy. To roughly suggest, it is this: Ordinary steam, or "wet steam," as it is called, when it enters the cylinder is condensed more or less into water, and thus much of its power is lost. The problem is to "superheat" the steam, that is, to make "wet steam" "dry steam," so that when it enters the cylinder it will not become water at all, but remain steam and do the work of steam. It is claimed by the lecturer, Professor Ripper, one of the most experienced engineers of England, that this problem has been solved, and that from 25 to 50 per cent of steam energy is saved. If this is so, then there is to be a new and wonderful evolution of engine and steam power, and Sheffield has the honor of its initiation in this country.

It will be seen, by what I have tried to tell, what a varied experience I had at Sheffield; what contrasts I met with in this metropolis of iron; that alongside its smoke and dirt are glittering expanses of art and poetry, and it is well worth a visit of many days. It has a population of about 350,000. I hope I shall see it again and my Freethought friends also, who have treated me so generously.

From Sheffield, on Thursday afternoon, July 4th, without any accompaniment of patriotic fire-crackers or cannon, I take my way to York, to famous York, which indeed has a solidity of ancientness about it that is truly magnificent and somewhat appalling. Here is the old wall of the Romans and the gateways, etc. Mr. Wm. Johnson, who came from York to Sheffield to attend lectures, met me at the station, and the first thing we did was to take a walk around the old city on the lofty stone battlements that had witnessed many a fierce and bloody encounter. York is now a railroad town with railroad shops. Two hundred trains pass every day. It has a population of 60,000. The largest part of the city is now outside the walls. The river Ouse runs through its center. At the end of the southern wall is the Castle and Clifford's tower, in the latter of which two thousand Jews were once slain. We visit the municipal buildings, and also the ruins of St. Mary's Abbey and the ancient hospital near by. These are interesting ruins, dating back several hundred years. The Abbey was destroyed by Cromwell. It was once a stately building as large, apparently, as the present cathedral. There are many things to be seen in York. There are old-fashioned buildings still standing. There are still the narrow streets and over-hanging walls, so that from the second-story one could almost shake hands with his neighbor across the way as he leans forward from his chamber-window. I enjoy perambulating the streets of this quaint city, traversing its walls, looking at its great cathedral, and watching the moonlight and the shadows on the river and the parks, and the masses of people as they throng the central avenues. Friday morning I visit the cathedral. This is the largest Gothic cathedral in England, and said to be the largest this side the Alps. It is larger than Westminster Abbey or St. Paul's. It is an immense and imposing structure. It has two great towers in front, with a vast central tower 213 feet in height. Its entire length from east to west is 524 feet; its extreme breadth north to south 250 feet. We wander through the vast spaces of this temple, which has stood for centuries. The present structure was begun in 1070. But below in the crypt can be seen the remains of ancient walls which go back to the seventh century. The window at the east end is considered the largest illuminated window in the world. It is 76 feet in length and 33 feet in width, and wonderfully illuminated. It is impossible to convey an idea of its radiant splendor. After traversing the depths of this great cathedral, and looking upon the graves of warriors and kings and bishops, after looking at its marvelous walls and windows upon which so much labor has been expended at a penny a day, we climb the massive tower itself, 65 feet in breadth, and with 273 steps from the bottom to the top. An extensive view is presented from this lofty station.

The country about York for miles away is level. The city lies at our feet, the quaint old houses standing among those of modern style. The vast roof of the cathedral itself extends a hundred feet beneath. It was a place for imagination to revel in the greatness of the past and the wonder of the future. Other places of interest are the Bootham Bar, with Norman tower erected about the end of the thirteenth century; the Manor House, once a royal residence; the Lendal Bridge, from whence can be seen a long sweep of the winding Ouse; the Mansion House, the walls of which are ornamented with historical portraits of great value; the Guildhall, dating from 1446, with its beautiful colored windows; the Theater Royal, erected in 1765, over the site of St. Peter's church—a great improvement. It is said that Constantine the Great was born in York. Not much credit that to the city. He was also invested here by the Roman legions with the imperial purple.

I thoroughly enjoyed my few hours' visit at York. Mr. and Mrs. Johnson gave me a hearty English welcome. Two of their sons are now in America, and expect to make that country their home; and so my friends have a fellow feeling for those who come from the Western shores, seeing that they have given their quota to the population of the great republic. Mr. Johnson was once an earnest Christian, and wrote a pamphlet in support of the faith; but he is now a thorough Liberal and always ready to do his share of pioneer work. Mrs. Johnson is a born Freethinker, and has never passed through the clouds of superstition. I shall not forget the hospitality of these friends in this ancient cathedral city, which is one of the most superb monuments of a religious and barbaric past combined with the splendor and industry of the nineteenth century. Within a stone's throw of the cathedral rolls the railway locomotive and flames the electric light.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Religion and Crime.

The latest Prussian census makes interesting reading, so much the more as it effectively contradicts the orthodox statement that religion and piety are most prevalent where crimes are least in number. Berlin, according to the well-known anti-Semite and royal court preacher, Dr. Stoecker, is a veritable Babylon. But statistics prove that in the orthodox East Prussia, with three times as many ministers as Berlin, there are to every 10,000 of population 170.4 criminals; in West Prussia, with four times the proportion of ministers, the rate is 180; in Posen, 164.1; in Hamburg, 131.66; in Bremen, 168.91, while the ungodly Berlin shows but 123.5 per ten thousand. Murder, in first and second degrees, in Wurtemberg and East Prussia, is three times as high proportionately to population, as in Berlin; in Pomerania and Bavaria, more than double, and in Silesia double. Theft in Berlin is 31.4; in West Prussia, 47.6; in East Prussia, 49.4, and in Posen, 50 to every 10,000 inhabitants.

From these official statistics Dr. Bruno Wille has drawn some very instructive conclusions. After citing the figures regarding Berlin, he conclusively proves that only 65 per cent of children born of Lutheran parents are baptized; only 25 per cent are married by ministers, the 75 per cent being married by secular officials; and at only one-fifth part of funerals does a Lutheran minister officiate, 80 per cent having no clergyman of any denomination whatever in attendance.

Eight honest citizens of Tennessee spent their Fourth of July in Rhea county jail for failing to remain idle while the people of the established religion worshiped. And yet, while these men were suffering for violating a dogma of the state established creed, the Fourth of July orator of Tennessee delivered himself of flowery periods in praise of the "land of the free and the home of the brave,"—American Sentinel.

The Great Boston Love-Feast.

The Christians held a great love-feast in Boston on the Fourth, and according to the *Boston Standard, which is my authority, the love of God was shed abroad in such special manner that battered faces, cracked skulls, blood and thunder and death were the result. I had supposed that Catholics were Christians; they believe in the fall, the miraculous conception, the crucifixion, resurrection, ascension, and all the rest of it; but the Standard says they are "thugs." J. D. Hooker, who is good authority, says that the thugs "believe in a divine original," and so do Christians. Thus between the Standard and Hooker the fact seems to be established that all Christians are thugs.

Well, the Catholic thugs were one of the Christian parties to the love-feast, and the A. P. A.'s and other Protestant thugs were the second party. The Standard seems to make a distinction between Catholic thugs and other Christian thugs, but with my glasses on I am unable to see the difference.

The Standard speaks of the bitter opposition, which for years has existed, against our free institutions. Just what we have been saying, for these many years, but the Standard does not seem to have caught on until after the great love-feast.

It appears that one party to the feast constructed a small school-house and painted it red, after the style of the New England school-house, and it was put on wheels and drawn by four horses. It was fourteen feet long, seven feet wide, and nine feet high, with windows and a door. Headed by the "little red school-house," about five thousand Christian thugs with banners paraded the streets. One of the reverend thugs proposed to stand in the door of the red thing, with a Bible resting upon the Stars and Stripes. This was a chip on the Protestant shoulder, and evidently the Protestant thugs expected that the Catholic thugs would knock it off, for the reverend one was cautioned against the danger, and so stood with his open Bible and flag in one of the windows.

The Standard speaks of the "little red school-house" as an emblem of American institutions—free schools; but the Bible above the flag shows the Christian idea of free schools—free to them to educate bigots who will respect the Stars and Stripes only so long as they are allowed the privilege of using the schools to promulgate their barbarous doctrines and hocus-pocus legends. It appears that a rough time was expected, for, besides ten mounted policemen and three hundred on foot, a number of "military companies were held in readiness" in case God's love should be too powerfully manifested by the followers of the meek and lowly. The Standard says that "just around the corner a gang of toughs [Catholic toughs] were waiting," and then speaks of a "murderous gang of thugs, all of whom were Catholics." Don't it beat all what endearing epithets these Christian thugs do apply to each other!

Well, the Christian thugs out of the procession began to crowd and spit upon those in the procession, and both got so filled with the love of the Lord that they fell to thumping and bruising each other with their fists. Finally their fervor waxed so hot that fistful demonstrations became entirely too tame, and it could be expressed only with clubs, stones, and brickbats. One of the saintly thugs seized another by the throat with one hand, and, in order to enlighten him as to the rules of the feast, raised a heavy club and allowed it to gently descend upon the latter's knowledge-box, spoiling a new hat, opening the scalp so as to give the bump of veneration a chance to enlarge, and causing the earth to strike him with such force as to render him silly. Thus the subject was not only enlightened, but he had a chance to study the stars.

A woman accompanied by three daughters showed that she belonged to the angelic host by the tender and endearing names she applied to the thugs in the procession. Then, to demonstrate the equality of the sexes, she let fly a right-hander, which landed upon the "mug" of an A. P. A. and laid him sprawling in the street. She then retreated in good order without any flank movement.

A man having a sword thought to diversify the entertainment, and seeing a man who, he fancied, had too much cheek, he laid it open by a stroke of his weapon. The other fellow, instead of following the scriptural injunction to turn the other cheek, remembered that "he who fights and runs away may live to fight another day," and so turned tail instead. The same swordsman, moved by the holy spirit, likewise essayed to teach one of the saintly thugs not to poke his nasal organ into a love-feast until he was invited; so with another pass he cut the intruder's nose clean from his face. At the resurrection, when noses are counted, he will have to carry his nose in his hand or be left out.

Thus did these servants of the Lord greet one another, extending the right hand of fellowship, and seeming intent only upon sending one another into the divine presence by the most direct and speedy route possible.

The Standard thus describes the scene: "Men with blood flowing down their cheeks were seen on all sides. Stones were fired into the crowd. Several pistols were discharged, one man was killed, and shouts and groans filled the air."

Wasn't that a sight to tickle the gods? Wonder that they were not translated. Heaven must have been so near that, by faith, they could shake hands with the apostles, and hear the twang of the heavenly harps. Don't see how they could wait for their white robes and crowns.

Well, let the lambs of God play together, and let the Kilkenny cats frisk and purr; the result is about the same in both cases.

MORAL.

The Rev. H. F. H. Miller's Bible had no more business on the flag than the Koran or Butler's "Hudibras." Not half as appropriate as some of the works of Thomas Paine.

A Christian is never in the way of duty unless he is holding his old Jew-book under somebody's nose. When one is called as a witness or initiated into office, or makes an affidavit, on various occasions, he is asked to kiss this old relic of ignorance and barbarism.

There was no natural enmity between the two parties to the Boston love-feast, and had it not been for this old book, no fight would have occurred.

Some of the pious thugs spat and threw quids of tobacco upon the open Bible. Why did not God strike those dead who spat upon his holy word? He used to be up to such tricks in his younger days. What a chance there was for a display of his almighty power! If he had struck those dead who spat upon the Bible, it would have done more to establish a sacred regard for his word than all the reverend ranters could accomplish in a hundred years.

Fifty years ago, if a Liberal had marched in a procession carrying the "Age of Reason" resting upon the American flag, which would have been a hundred times more appropriate, the saintly thugs would have made common cause, and stoned him to death.

The trouble is, the Christian is always exercising privileges which he is not willing to grant to others. Sauce for the Liberal gander must not be given to the Christian goose.

It seems to be a hard fact for Christians to learn that Jew, Mohammedan, Buddhist, Atheist, all have the same rights under the Constitution that they have. The truth is, the Protestant thugs want to have everything their own way, and the Catholic thugs want the same thing, while the Liberals declare that neither must succeed.

Any man who honestly and sincerely believes the Bible to be the word of God is a dangerous man, because it teaches polygamy, treachery, intemperance, deception, persecution, war, theft, murder, incest, rape, and revenge. A man who believes such teaching to be the unerring word of God must be swayed by his belief, and will be guilty of the grossest outrages when he honestly thinks he is obeying the will of God. Most of the persecutions have been instigated in this way.

The believers in the Bible will constantly be trying to shape the civilization of the nineteenth century to the ignorance and barbarism of three thousand years ago. They will be trying to serve God by acts which are marked by all the savage, tyrannical, and brutal features of those in whose imagination this hideous God was first brought into existence, and whose ideas of civilization were so low that they stoned a man to death for picking up sticks on the Sabbath.

And yet these Christian unfortunates think that the government ought to be turned over into their hands, that they may run it according to their notion of the will of this child-killing, woman-stealing God.

I don't quarrel with the Christian because he gets down on his knees and holds a palaver with a being who has no existence except in his imagination, but because he won't mind his own business—he keeps meddling with my affairs and claims the right to dictate to me whether I shall get shaved on one day in the week or on another.

If the Christian could reason at all he would see that I am no more bound to obey him because he is a Christian, than he is bound to do as I say because I am an Infidel.

What business is it to the Christian whether a man hoes his corn on Sunday or Monday—whether

I go to church or attend a theater? But the zealot will say that these matters are regulated by law, and the law must be obeyed. That is just what he claimed when he whipped women and hung witches; but who made the law, and what would be the consequences if Christians should get full control, with God in the Constitution, and Christ acknowledged as the supreme ruler? We should be compelled to attend church on Sunday or be hauled over Christian coals, as those were when ecclesiastics shaped all legislation.

Who wants to be governed by the whim of a Christian? If he should hear of a man hoeing corn on Sunday a half mile away he would be greatly disturbed, but the clang of a half dozen church bells on Sunday does not disturb him in the least.

He sees the hand of God in everything, and believes that God does everything for the best, yet he runs for his dugout when God sends a cyclone. And then the Christian is never quite as happy as when he is hoping to make somebody do as he says. He goes into the mechanic shop and tells the mechanic when he must work and when he must rest. He goes to the dealer and tells him what hours he may sell and when he must close up. He pokes his Bible under your nose and says it must be read in school by a Christian teacher. He dictates to you what may be sent to you through the mails—keeps a smut agent to pronounce on what you say and write, and he takes you off to jail if you say or do anything which displeases him. It would be about as safe to put our liberties into the hands of such keepers as it would to put dynamite into the hands of a lunatic. They have got too much power already. No, no, we do not forget that when Christians had the power they whipped women, hung witches, banished Quakers, slit noses, branded, burnt, tortured, and imprisoned without mercy, and for a thousand years persecuted and banished the teachers of science, and spread a gloom over all Europe which the world will never forget.

Washington said this was in no sense a Christian government, and it never will be until the names of Paine and Jefferson and Franklin and those who founded it are forgotten. If the Christian should force God into the Constitution the fight would still be on, for the Protestant thugs would want the Bible in the schools, to which the Catholic thugs would never consent, and the Freethinkers would never consent to have their rights trampled under foot.

When will religionists learn that their peculiar notions depend upon early training and environment more than the reason of the religion which they embrace?

Christians assert and claim to believe that this is a Christian government. Did God "ordain and establish this Constitution," or was it ordained and established by the people of the United States? God had nothing more to do with the formation of this government than the imaginary heathen gods did which were worshiped thousands of years ago. The less God is allowed to meddle with our governmental affairs the better it will be. Better let him remain on his great white throne surrounded by his harping angels, and busy himself getting up cyclones and earthquakes, floods and epidemics, so that Christians will always have the "goodness of God" before their eyes.

Now I want to show the Christian how near he comes to having a Christian government, and upon what foundation his claim rests:

"Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion."

"No religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office or public trust under the United States."

Now, my Christian friend, can you not see that you have no rights under the Constitution not guaranteed to the Jew, the Mohammedan, the Buddhist, and the Atheist?

There can be no doubt that the founders of the government intended to give the greatest latitude in regard to religious matters. At the same time they meant to protect all, and grant special privileges to none.

Let God be forced into the Constitution and Christ be acknowledged as the supreme ruler, and all the scheming officers and politicians will be on the "Lord's side," and the hand of the church will be felt at our throats, and liberal-minded men will be taught lessons in Christian charity and Christian forbearance, which they will not soon forget. Not that Christians mean to be tyrannical. Oh, no; not a bit more than they meant to be cruel when they bored holes with hot irons through the tongues of heretics! But they form certain notions as to what would be pleasing to their God; and what they think their God would do they will do without the least thought of tyranny or cruelty. So far are the minds of Christians under this hallucination that they have murdered their own children, in the belief that God required them to make such a sacrifice.

The Christian's God has too many misfits in his dealings with men to be trusted. He rarely does what the Christian tells him to do, and never pays any attention to his cheap advice. When the Christian asks a favor he always has business in another direction. When he prays for health, God sends an epidemic. When he prays for rain, God sends a drouth, and yet the poor Christian dupe is ever on his knees, and, notwithstanding all of these disappointments, believes that God lends a listening ear to all his petitions, and never loses confidence in his imaginary idol.

Let the American people never forget that Christianity is a species of insanity, and those who would put the destiny of the government into Christian hands would place their fortunes in the keeping of lunatics.

Was Bennett imprisoned because he was a bad man, and guilty of a great outrage? Harman and Wise and the Seventh-day Adventists are worried and persecuted and imprisoned because they are in the hands of the viciously insane.

If Christians ever get control of the government the sun of our liberties will go down, and we shall be compelled to bow to the church for the privilege of carrying our heads.

JOHN PECK.

Naples, N. Y.

Observations.

The Free Press, Wexford, Ireland, contains an advertisement of agricultural implements of local manufacture, accompanied by the inquiry:

Why support Saxon or Yankee labor abroad?

Shillalys and shamrocks! Have we Americans consented to be known as inhabitants of the Greater Ireland, only that our products may be boycotted as cheap pauper labor from abroad? And have we raised large subscriptions for Irish Home Rule, in order that we may be classed in advertisements with the Sassenachs? Is it possible that we have been too fresh?

The temporary illness of Mr. J. D. Shaw, editor of the Independent Pulpit, has called a new and virile pen into the service of Freethought—that of J. T. Shaw, son of the above. J. T. is young, but gifted. In pursuance of his editorial duties he recently wrote as follows:

Education we may need, but it is an education that will lead to temperance. We cannot legislate morals. We cannot make men good. We cannot make them temperate. We can only show them the superiority of morality over vice. We can distinguish for them good and evil, showing the superiority of one over the other. We can point out the benefits of temperance and show them how to avoid excesses and thus aid them in making themselves moral, good, and temperate, this being the only method by which these results are satisfactorily and permanently obtained. To prohibit is to create an appetite or an itch for that prohibited. To say "thou shalt not," is to provoke the "I will." Morals may be evoked by persuasion and argument, but by force never.

That would be good sense, even though it were found in the Bible, but it evoked the mental processes of Mr. C. C. Moore, of the Blue Grass Blade, who believes in temperance as superinduced by the club, and who accuses Mr. Shaw of writing for the unwashed "hoodlum masses." It is sufficient to say that young Mr. Shaw is equal to the occasion, and that his powers of rhetoric enable him to knock Mr. Moore higher than Gilderoy's kite. I quote a passage:

If he [Moore] were capable of seeing beyond his own conclusions; if he were liberal enough to allow others to have any conclusions; if he could discuss with a gentleman as a gentleman; if he could be made to understand that others are as capable of honestly taking and conscientiously holding a position on any subject, prohibition included, as himself; if he were not so ready to call those who, in obedience to honest convictions, differ with him, "liars, hypocrites," etc.; in fact, if he could restrain his temper, The Pulpit might, without danger of tarnishing and embittering its pure pages with the spleen which is ejected with his thought, and spread with his pen throughout his effusions, invite him to a candid discussion of the subject so dear to his heart, of which he holds himself, armed with the above mentioned Blade, as champion, ready to do battle even, as the cherubims of yore waved their flaming swords in defense of Eden.

A trifle rich in unpruned luxuriance of invective, but demanded by the circumstances. Young Mr. Shaw will hold his own. The senior editor of the Pulpit also takes a hand in the debate, and if less rhetorical than the junior, he is sufficiently severe. In all that I have ever read of personal controversy I have seen no better example of sarcasm than Mr. Shaw's remark that while he does not consider Mr. Moore worthy of serious reply, "he is an admirable subject for a new beginner to practice upon."

The funeral of Prof. Thomas Henry Huxley was had at East Finchley on July 4th. Saving the interment of the body, the proceedings were a mockery and a desecration, being conducted according to the ritual of the Church of England. Supposedly speaking on behalf of the deceased, the officiating clergyman read the words:

Christ, hav mercy upon us!

Amos Waters was present, with Saladin and Frederick Millar. These "walked sadly away, thinking one thought—Superstition is endowed and fortified. It curses the cradle and the grave." The dead man's relatives missed one possible indignity. They might have caused his works to be burned by the common hangman.

Herbert Spencer has recently added a valuable term to the dictionary of definitions. He calls it the "pseud-idea," and it means sham thinking, or a thought that is not a thought. We have a vivid illustration of it, he says, in the assertion, not infrequently made concerning some remarkable phenomenon—"Oh, it is caused by electricity;" an assertion which, in both speaker and hearers, leaves a contented feeling that they understand the matter; the truth being that none of them has the remotest idea what electricity is, and none of them has the remotest idea how electricity, did they know its nature, could produce the effect observed. What they take to be their ideas are simply pseud or false ideas. Mr. Spencer employs this illustration to show how little real meaning there is in Mr. Balfour's proposition that "out of the depths of unfathomable mystery there emerge the certitudes of religion, the primary certitude being the existence of a rational author for the ordered system of phenomena." I want to apply it to an example of the pseud-idea that falls conveniently under my eye. The other day Gen. Thomas J. Morgan, of these parts, delivered a patriotic address on "Building a Nation," and in casting about for a basis for his commonwealth he discovered, or said he did, that a nation having no earthly king must accept a heavenly one, and that, to be permanent, it must "rest upon God." Thereat every pious and imbecil hearer nodded assent and felt that the country was safe; but, as in the case of those who accepted the electrical illustration, neither the speaker nor the hearer had a definite idea what God is; nor, if they had known or thought they knew what he is, could either have told how to go about founding a nation on him. And what is true of General Morgan and his hearers is true of nearly all who talk and listen to theological discourse. It is mainly true, also, of a great deal that goes under the head of political and economic teaching. The thinking thought to be thought is sham thinking—a mere impression, and confused at that, like one gob of mud striking another.

If those who speak and write, and those who listen or read, will keep in mind the difference between the true idea and the pseud-idea they will not talk and write so much, nor will they accept so much as genuine thought which is in reality only aimless and unguided mental divagation, resembling the coursing of a calf around a barnyard. It would put an end to preaching, which is a result that can't very well be helped.

In the July 6th issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER the author of "Observations" in criticizing the article of the Rev. J. J. Porter on (1) the advisory letter of Franklin to Paine says: "The facts, as recorded by Mr. Paine himself, are that the first part of the 'Age of Reason' was written in 1793, being completed in December of that year, six hours before the author's arrest took place. Franklin had then been dead about three years." Are we to infer from this (2) that Franklin had no knowledge of the nature of the first part of the "Age of Reason," or had not read the manuscript? In the first of this letter Franklin writes: "I have read your manuscript with some attention," etc. I am unable to find in the biography or writing concerning Paine the time or date when he wrote the first part of "Age of Reason," only when it was handed to Joel Barlow for publication just before his imprisonment, 1793. May it not have been written a long time before this, judging from Paine's own words in the beginning of this work where he writes, "It has been my intention for several years to publish [not write] my thoughts on religion?"

Lee, N. Dak., July 20. H. O. SYVERTSON.

Why does Mr. Syvertson say (1) "the advisory letter of Franklin to Paine," when there is no evidence that it was addressed to Paine? Franklin's biographer, Sparks, says that the letter was without date or direction, that it was first published by one William Temple Franklin, and the reader is kept guessing whether or not any original is in existence. (2) In the preface to the second part of the "Age of Reason" Paine repeats his statement that he had long intended to publish his thoughts on religion, and then proceeds to detail the facts that led him to hurry the work. He says: "The circumstances, however, which existed in France in the latter end of the year 1793 determined me to delay no longer." He further describes his surroundings—"the intolerant spirit of church persecution had transferred itself into politics—the tribunal styled revolutionary supplied the place of an Inquisition, and the guillotine and stake outdid the fire and the fagot of the church." He saw some of his most intimate friends destroyed, others carried daily to prison, and had reason to believe that the same danger was approaching himself. "Under these disadvantages," he says, "I began the former part of the 'Age of Reason'; I had besides neither Bible nor Testament to refer to." From this it is reasonable to infer that the first part of the "Age of Reason" was written say in 1792-3, while the atrocities of the French Revolution were culminating; for it was under such circumstances that the author tells us he "began" the work, and under the same circumstances he completed it six hours before his arrest. If he wrote the "Age of Reason" in Franklin's time, when he was in America, his being without a Bible is a puzzle; but in Paris, in 1793, an English copy may have been hard to come at.

One sentence in the letter makes it questionable whether any man in his senses would have addressed it to Paine—"You might easily display your excellent talents of reasoning upon a less hazardous subject, and thereby obtain a rank with our most distinguished authors." Such advice given to one who was not the best read writer of his day might be sound, if altogether worldly, but to Paine it would have been empty. He had more readers than Franklin, he was already a distinguished author, and his subject, that of American independence, was the most "hazardous" he could have chosen.

If Benjamin wrote the letter, his advice about burning the "piece" before it was seen by any other person might better have been followed by himself.

GEO. E. MACDONALD.

IF.

If, for the agony we suffer here,
We are repaid in future happiness,
Then what a joy have some of us stored up;
If, for the loss of all that we hold dear,
If, for the misery and wretchedness,
If, for the bitter of life's wormwood cup,
At last the scale is balanced, what will be—
To some—the pleasures of Eternity!

If, for the suffering we cause to others,
The unkind words we might have left unsaid,
The heart-breaks we occasion; if, for all
The needless sorrow we have caused our brothers,
It is repaid us after we are dead,
'Twere better for us that the shroud and pall Should end us utterly, than we should be Participants in that Eternity.

Thus is it that we stand perplexed, uncertain.
Some ills we bear, no doubt, and some create.
Between the two the scales may turn contrary.
And so we quake a little, ere the curtain
Rises to let us look upon our fate;
We quake and turn and dread, uncertain very Whether we wish to die quite dead, or be Chance-takers for this same Eternity.

Freethought Progress Abroad.

The Dutch Freethinkers have started a propaganda fund. . . . Women's rights are gaining ground rapidly in Holland.

Our German friends have formed the "Freethought Society of the City of New York," and meet every first and third Sunday of the month at 3 o'clock at 212 E. Fifth street.

At the International Freethought Congress to be held at Brussels, September 22-24, 1895, the following questions will be discussed: 1. The Abolition of War. 2. Relation of the Church to the State. 3. The Equality of Man and Woman. 4. The Religious Emancipation of Woman. Freethinkers in the United States and Canada who wish to attend will please communicate with Gustave Nelson, M.D., Minden City, Mich., who, as member of the general council and correspondent for the United States and Canada, will give desired information. Secular papers please print this notice in each issue published until September 15, 1895.

The Freethinkers of Belgium contemplate carrying the war of light into the dark province of Flanders. . . . A new Freethought society has been formed in Belgium, Les Disciples de Cesar De Paape at Huy. . . . The Freethought Orphan Asylum at Mont. St. Amand, in Catholic Flanders, held, on January 6th, a New Year's celebration. The school has 160 inmates, and has earned the well-merited praise of all Freethinkers. . . . During the month of March Belgium had fifteen secular funerals reported. . . . The Freethought society of Charleroi, Belgium, instituted last Christmas a festival for "Old Age," in which veteran Freethinkers, accompanied by wives and children, marched through the streets with flying banners and music. Speeches and a musical concert closed the celebration. . . . De Rede is the name of a new quarterly Freethought magazine published at Brussels, in the Dutch language. Its aim is to further the propaganda of Freethought. The first number contains six articles by well-known Dutch and Belgian Freethinkers.

Captain Otto Thomson has translated into Swedish Colonel Ingersoll's "The Old and the New Religion." We are glad to see our old friend back at work. . . . Fremad and Rodhuggeren, Scandinavian Populist papers, published in South Dakota and Minnesota respectively, are doing good work for Freethought. But we are sorry to state that the editor of the former has had to promise that no more articles like that of "Peko's" shall appear. We believe the editor will not lose money by letting his paper become an "arena." Will "Peko" please send his address to Dr. Gustave Nelson, Minden City, Mich. . . . Nya Sanningar, weekly, edited by Petrus Asplund, has reached us. The paper is bright and spicy. The articles by Moses are of special interest. This number contains a well-finished picture of Victor Lennstrand, and we hope soon to see one of Captain Thomson, whom the Swedish Freethinkers cannot honor too much. We advise all of our friends who on our advice subscribed for Fritänkaren to transfer their allegiance to the new banner-bearer of Swedish Freethought. Address Nya Sanningar, Barnhusgatan 6, Stockholm, Sweden. Price, including postage, $1.25 a year.

A Missionary Scheme.

Probably no one book has made more converts to common sense and won more people away from superstition than Paine's "Age of Reason." It is a book, as Colonel Ingersoll says, that furnishes an immense amount of food for thought. It is written for the average mind, and is a straightforward, honest investigation of the Bible and of the Christian system. It has liberalized us all. It puts arguments in the mouths of the people; it puts the church on the defensive; it enables somebody in every village to corner the parson. It has never been "answered" and never can be.

What ought to be done, and what we propose to do, is to scatter this book broadcast—to give and to have given away thousands of them among the people. Every church-member that any Freethinker knows ought to have one. It will do that church-member good, even if his wife burns it. He will read a few pages in it at least before she gets hold of it. But perhaps she too will read it. That book in a family is bound to do good—an immense amount. It has liberalized thousands and will liberalize thousands more. That book started THE TRUTH SEEKER, for from reading it D. M. Bennett, whom we all loved when living, and whose memory we now honor, became a Liberal. Previously he was a rigid churchman. There are more like him in the country, and it is they we ought to reach.

Our proposition is for every reader of this paper to send us the names and addresses of EIGHT of his Christian acquaintances and ONE DOLLAR, and we will mail each of them a copy of Paine's "AGE OF REASON."

If you don't know eight Christians you care enough about to convert, name those whom you do want to convert, send the dollar, and we will mail the remainder to some editor or public man or preacher worth saving.

In this way public opinion can be made and the church undermined. A few Freethinkers in a community can club together and convert a whole congregation, leaving the minister high and dry in his pulpit. Or they can send us the funds and we will make the selection of the target and take the responsibility of the work. What we want is to scatter the book among the people and have it read.

Remember, we do all the work—all we ask is the names and addresses and means to mail the book. Surely everybody can help in this and make thousands of Freethinkers. Don't select the names of indifferentists, but those of good church people, with a preference for those who have the capacity to think if they only are steered in the right direction.

AUXILIARY WORK.

Several of our good friends have written us that in their opinion the work, "Self-Contradictions of the Bible," should go along with Paine's "Age of Reason" as a missionary pamphlet. Mr. J. R. Perry puts it thus: "As a missionary document the 144 Self-Contradictions will go hand in hand with the 'Age of Reason.' I think any person getting the one will get the other. It is the grubbing process, clearing out the roots and stones, necessary to preparing the soil for good seeds of common sense." And as it is our delight to furnish the implements for this sort of agricultural operations, we are willing to do our part and will send the "Self-Contradictions of the Bible" to those who will distribute it among their Christian friends, FOR A DOLLAR A DOZEN. Or we will send twelve copies to as many different addresses for one dollar.

Now let the friends of Freethought turn to and circulate "Self-Contradictions" as well as the "Age of Reason." Send both books out by the thousand and watch the result. Flood the country with them, and let the Christians know what their holy paper fetish, the Bible, is like and why it is worthless as a guide to any good.

FRANKLIN STEINER lectures in Monroe, Ia., Aug. 2d. Mr. J. M. Hart has built a hall in this place for the use of Liberals. Mr. Steiner expects to lecture in Newton, Ia., Aug. 4th.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find $3, for which you will please send me THE TRUTH SEEKER for one year and "Pictorial Text-Book." I am very much pleased with the paper and the principles it advances, and I can assure you, dear sir, that where I know of any possibility of gaining a new subscriber I will do what I can for the paper.

MICHAEL RYAN.

IDAHO SPRINGS, COL., June 16, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find $6, for which send THE TRUTH SEEKER for one year and your "Pictorial Text-Book" to the undersigned.

One can but admire the grand fight you are making through the columns of your paper for religious freedom in America, and you can count on two true converts to your church in Mr. Lacey and myself. We both wish you well in your fight, and may in the future be able to assist you in a more substantial way.

MERIT OWEN,
HUBERT LACOEY.

RICHMOND HILL, N. Y., July 16, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $3, for which please send THE TRUTH SEEKER for one year and the "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book." I am very much pleased with your paper, and, judging from the few specimen copies I have had the pleasure of reading, I think it is filling a noble rank in the battle against error and superstition, and in warning the American people against the dangers of priestcraft and the union of church and state, which, in every step, phase, and feature, tends only to human slavery and the decivilization of the country or countries wherein its power is felt.

Freethought and superstition will not mix; they are the fruits of different trees entirely, and where the latter has flourished the most, history has been the darkest. And, strange as it may appear, superstition is born of religion; or, in other words, show us a man with a religion, and we will show you a superstitious man. But Freethought is the only antidote.

Yours respectfully, T. L. BEEBE.

Cannot Keep the Candle.

SHREVE, O., July 16, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $1, for which please send me two copies of the "Candle from Under the Bushel," and one "Bible Morals." This makes four "Candles from Under the Bushel" for which I have sent. It is not a very good book to keep, as everybody who sees one wants it.

Yours, etc., H. J. COLLIER.

For Twenty-Four Months Longer.

ELK GROVE, CAL., July 8, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I send $5 for two years' renewal. It is but a poor acknowledgment of the profound sense of personal obligation that you have placed me under by the gallant and efficient struggle you are making for the cause of Civilization vs. Barbarism. I shall ever remain your debtor,

J. CAPLES.

Sorry He's Late.

CANTREL, IA., July 8, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I feel glad to be able to address you again, and you probably feel like hearing from me, as I am a little behind on my paper. I guess it is all right. Please send me THE TRUTH SEEKER for six months, and Greg's "Creed of Christendom," and in this letter you will find $2.75. Wishing you success,

Yours respectfully, ALEX. FIX.

Those Who Would Cannot.

EUCLID, N. Y., July 15, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I see by the tab on my wrapper that I am in debt for one week, so I will send $3 to pay for another year for the best paper I ever saw. I would like "Four Hundred Years of Freethought" and several other books, but am not able to raise any more money now, so will have to make THE TRUTH SEEKER do. All numbers go out on missionary work, but none who would like it are able to pay for the paper.

Wishing a grand success to THE TRUTH SEEKER and Heston, the artist,

Yours truly, WARTEN C. BARRUS.

CATHLAMET, WASH., July 9, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Permit me to invite all persons who see this communication to attend the Secular Sunday-school held at Labor Hall, Union block, First and Stark streets, Portland, Or., at eleven in the forenoon, and in the evening. The lectures and literary exercises are the best I ever heard. Miss Nettie Olds, although a mere schoolgirl, is a prodigy, and will, in a few years, become one of the leading women of this nation.

Liberals, an annual contribution from you to this deserving genius would make this school a model for Liberal work in other cities and bless our cause beyond conception.

C. BRAL.

Mortuary—Nicholas Strader.

LINCOLN, KAN., July 13, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I write this to let you and all who read THE TRUTH SEEKER know of the death of a comrade in the Freethought cause, Mr. Nicholas Strader, of Maplewood, Otter Tail county, Minn.

He had been sick since April 24th, and died June 30th. He had been a Freethinker for many years, and died as he had lived. The Christians tried hard to take advantage of a grief-stricken people, but they failed, and Mr. Strader's requests were carried out as nearly as was possible. Mr. W. H. Slater delivered a secular funeral address that was praised by all who heard it.

Mr. Strader was a kind and loving husband and father, and he has left many relatives and friends, who are deeply grieved by his death. He was honest in all his dealings, and always willing to give a helping hand to those in need. He was a great admirer of Paine, Ingersoll, Putnam, and all others who have tried to make the world better.

A. PRESTON.

That Sounds Just Like Him.

NEW HARTFORD, IA., July 13, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $5 for another year's subscription and the $2.75 Freethinker's Badge Pin. No. 26 failed to get here; if you have an extra, please send it. I have no suggestions to make on the matter contained in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and shall not ask you to reduce the price. If I did not think the paper well worth the money I should not take it, and although I know you must be always glad to be told just what to print, I can only suggest that you print what you damn please. In other words, I have no kick coming on the management of the best and cheapest paper that comes to my address.

Respectfully, MEL PIERCE.

Respects Other Students of Nature.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., Jan 25, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $5, to renew my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER for two years.

I received "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," and like it very much. I liked the portraits, but would like more of them, such as Draper, Winchell, Combe, Proctor, and Laplace—great scientists all—as their opinions carry great weight with people in forming conclusions. I was talking with a clergyman about theology, and told him that a personal God was unknown to our best scholars. He replied, "Much learning makes men mad."

I have just witnessed the death of an out-and-out Freethinker, a very moral, amiable, and refined woman. She had consumption, and had a long time to think of death, but died perfectly happy. She requested that there be no praying or ceremonies at her funeral, and that her body be cremated, and it was done just as she desired. So you see an Atheist can die just as happy as a Christian.

And, now, wishing you much success in your efforts to enlighten the people, I remain, Yours, etc., G. W. DOANE.

His Sunday Companion and Instructor.

HAWTHORNE, IA., July 7, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: In reading over the letters to THE TRUTH SEEKER I thought I would add one more to the waste basket. THE TRUTH SEEKER letters do not diminish in interest, and Friend Putnam's letters are unusually interesting. It would seem dull these breezy Sunday afternoons without THE TRUTH SEEKER. I often tell Christians that I think that there can be no heaven, because if we did go there it could not be a heaven to us to know that our friends were going to hell, which we could not help knowing. We have only one neighbor who will read THE TRUTH SEEKER and Liberal books. The "Candle From Under the Bushel" is certainly appropriately named. It shows that the whole story of the Bible is contrary to reason. I have always wanted the "Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times," by D. M. Bennett, and think that the next book I get will be that. Last week's illustration was an appropriate one—Freethought building a bridge to the Future and constructing the floor of the planks of the Demands of Liberalism.

WALTER RUNNELS.

A Very Common Error, Then.

CLINTON, IA., July 16, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $2 from Mr. Ellison, for he is highly pleased with the book. He is a convert of whom I am proud.

Allow me to call attention to what is intended to be a Scotch proverb that I have seen in the newspapers sometimes, and it just runs in my mind that THE TRUTH SEEKER may have been one of the papers in which it appeared. It may be of little consequence, only I always think that if a quotation or proverb is attempted, it might as well be correct. In the case I speak of, the words given were, "Mony a mickle maks a muckle." You will see the point when I tell you that mickle and muckle are two forms of the same word, used in different parts of the country. In Forfarshire, where I was born, we called it muckle; in the south and west counties it was mickle. It means a large quantity, and the proverb in correct wording, as we had it, was, "Mony littles maks a muckle," or it would be correct enough to say, "Many a little maks a meickle." Glad to know that Samuel is enjoying himself among the "furriners."

Fraternally, JAMES A. GREENHILL.

Will Abide in Our Camp.

MONDAMIN, IA., July 15, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I have been an occasional reader of your valuable paper for several years, and a regular trial-trip subscriber for the past four months, and, I must say, the longer I read it the better I like it. I admire, and fully indorse, your position on the Sunday rest question. I have always contended that to have equal justice to all citizens, my neighbor and myself should be protected in our different vocations on Sunday as well as other days, whether in weeding the garden, attending prayer-meeting, preaching, in fishing, playing baseball, or other games, etc., as long as we did not molest or disturb one another in our different amusements or work. Your attitude in regard to the Bible in public schools, taxation of church property, God-in-the-Constitution, A. P. A.'s, and all other religious issues, just suits my case and fills the bill exactly. I herewith inclose $6.50, for which please send "Four Hundred Years of Freethought" and THE TRUTH SEEKER as per announcement.

Although there are quite a number of Liberals and Freethinkers in this community, as far as I know there are but two subscribers, Mr. Eric Johnson and myself. We are doing a little missionary work by loaning our papers where we think they will do the most good, and we hope to be able, in the near future, to send you some substantial evidence in the way of subscriptions to THE TRUTH SEEKER.

For reform, J. L. McCLANAHAN.

A Confession.

OSCAR, I. T., July 20, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: For nine long years I was a slave to superstition until I met a Freethinker, who, by his reason and kindness, caused me to think and investigate the claims of Christianity. I first read "The Interview," by R. G. Ingersoll, who used such argument that no honest person could deny. Then I began to read "The World's Sixteen Crucified Saviors," by Graves. It is a book that will kill the argument of any minister. After reading a portion of this book I purchased "Wit, Wisdom, and Eloquence," by Ingersoll. And after that I said, Henceforth I will be a free man, and never will I again, while I live, bow in worship to the "God of the Jews." And I want to say that the remainder of my life I will do what little I can to make my fellowmen free men instead of slaves to superstition, and I am thankful that I am free myself, and will always bless the day when I began to investigate Christianity. The only thing that I regret is that I did not begin sooner, and that I have preached the "blessed gospel of Christ."

I am boarding with Mr. J. G. Hardy, a Freethinker, and I get a chance to read your paper. I love to read the grand truths it contains. Should some honest Christian see this, let me ask him a few questions: Is God a kind and merciful God? If so, then don't you think that he made a mistake when he created man? Don't you think he showed his kindness when he caused the bears to destroy those little children when they made sport of Elisha's bald head? Don't you think Christ lied when he said that "These signs shall follow them that believe; in my name shall they cast out devils," etc. (Mark xvi, 17, 18)? If anyone will cast out a devil, or heal the sick, or drink any deadly poison and still live, and do these things by the power of that old "Jehovah," then Christ did not lie, but if the Christian cannot do these things, then the book is false in that one place. Again, Ex. xxxiii, says that God talked face to face with Moses, and in the same chapter it says that "No man shall see God and live." Is not this a contradiction? I could quote many other passages to show the kindness of that God, but fear that this will find the waste-basket instead of a place in your paper. I am yours for humanity and intellectual liberty, LINA P. MANSFIELD.

LEXINGTON, KY., July 15, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: The burning spirit of piety, or rather the inspiration, of the Bible is found embodied in the interpolations which dot its pages.

There is no advance upon heathenism in the sacred volume except that expressed in the scraps from secular or stoical philosophers, borrowed occasionally from every available source, and this is mixed with expressions of blind unreasoning devotion to an immoral God. Nothing else is there to vary the sense of desolation and vulgarity inflicted upon the reader. But the idealism or true inspiration of Shakspere excels in refinement that of any other writer, ancient or modern. We do not speak of blemishes, for he does not pretend to be perfect.

The noble virtues taught by the ancestors of Confucius, and which are alluded to in the fifth chapter of Matthew, give great dignity to the Bible. But greater than these are the exalted conceptions of our bard in question, which land him and us in a heaven of thought far above the humdrum orthodox angels of Milton and Watts.

When Pericles finds his daughter, the holy sweetness of the scene is far superior to the criminal falsehood of the fable miracle-stories of the Old and New Testaments. What the Bible contains of modesty, benevolence, justice, humility, fortitude, patience, and love, is comprised in the one sentence, "The fear of God," which last, being an incongruous jumble of ideas and sentiments, deserves the name of fraud.

Perhaps questions like the following occur in secular catechisms:

Would an inspired writer speak of the existence of light before the creation of the source of light? Would a holy deity give orders to an army to commit outrages common in ancient warfare? When Sisera gained a victory, would a good God be pleased with the idea of giving "to every soldier a damsel or two?" Would a respectable God command you to offer tainted meat to strangers, or the taking possession of jewelry belonging to enemies? Could a life like that of Hosea be construed into a strict regard for the injunction, "Without holiness no man shall see the Lord?"

Nothing can excel the beauty of Mr. S. P. Putnam's style in the letters contributed to THE TRUTH SEEKER weekly, together with the richness and completeness of the information received. So graphic are his descriptions that we seem to be on the spot, viewing the scene drawn in all its splendor of light and shade by his powerful pen.

Buttons Made of Human Bones—A Lie.

ST. JACOB, ILL., July 16, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: If you will allow a raw lad in literature a little space, I'll say a word or two on the "Buttons Made of Human Bones." A short time ago the news (so-called) was circulated through our village by a few orthodox gentlemen whom I personally know, and with whom I greatly differ, that when Thomas Paine died, and was expressed to the place where he wished to be buried, no one could be found who could be induced to bury his remains; that the corpse was sold at public auction for a trifle, and that the purchaser, after being informed of his bad investment, yet wanting to realize something out of his deal, set to work and made buttons out of the bones of Thomas Paine. A sublime thought and deed!

But, first, let it be put down that if this is so, it took place in an orthodox community, or where there were Christian ministers who claim to be the spiritual advisers of men and their conscience keepers; where religious persecution and state hypocrisy waved the black banner; where religion raised its hateful and revengeful voice; where Christianity, robed and dressed in the garments that were saturated in the holy water of baptism, sought to defame, to destroy, to damn the souls of honest investigators—of men who manfully labored for the good of the world. If this was done, the believers in an eternal hell did it. And right here we may truthfully say that the graduates from the school of slander, those who are better qualified than anybody else for tearing down the character of man and woman and trampling them in the dust, are the exponents of gospel Christianity. I am really sorry that Christianity has representatives of this kind. They are jealous because they do not know where Moses was buried, if he was buried at all; and, therefore, make the unlearned believe that for Thomas Paine there was no burial spot. But suppose that buttons were made of the bones of Thomas Paine, and I could purchase one of them, I would consider myself very fortunate, and would wear it in remembrance of the Declaration of Independence, in the name of liberty, and in honor of the human race. I would wear it because he was among the first who stood for a republican form of government on this side of the ocean; because he was one of the heroes who built out of thirteen little sea-shore states the American republic; because he gave to us "The Crisis," "Common Sense," to man "The Rights of Man," and to the world at large the "Age of Reason." Thomas Paine was one of those who made the world better for having lived; and if we only had a few more statesmen like him to-day to attack the laws made for the protection of the Sabbath and creeds, the liberty of our country would be secure.

A Law of Development.

July 17, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Allow me to call your readers' attention to a theory of mine, affecting Materialism, Spiritualism, and the distribution of matter throughout space.

I recognize another element in the universe not recognized, as far as I know, by any one else; if so it is not understood as I understand it. Cold and electricity are the popular names of this element, heat and life its most prominent effects. This element is the life and only life of the universe. It distributes matter in space according to a natural law, putting it into all shapes in which we see it.

This element works continually, tearing down and building up worlds and solar systems, according to a fixed law. If this element was removed from the universe, matter would fill space with an equal density in the form of a gas. There is hardly any doubt about the sun being in a gaseous state; and should it become solid and dark—which is possible—it would raise the temperature of all the planets in the solar system, instead of cooling them as generally supposed; and the planetary orbits would increase in length many thousand miles. Following my theory further, if the earth were to fall toward the sun it would never strike it, but pass on beyond, and in a year or so would be again out in space on an orbit around the sun many million miles longer than it has to-day, but would gradually come back to its present orbit. Without this element there would be no motion of the other elements. Man's mind is nothing but this element working through natural laws similar to the working of an electric motor. Living men can communicate their thoughts through this element, but dead men are like an electric motor whose material has returned to the elements from which it came. As I recognize nothing in man but the elements, and death as his end so far as mental operations are concerned, yet believe in a possible foundation for Spiritualism, I will give some reasons for my belief: If we acknowledge the possibility of other human beings living on other planets, we must acknowledge the possibility of their being much higher developed mentally than we are. I believe we claim to have an instrument so delicate as to be affected by the roaring of the flames in the sun. That being the case, what is to prevent the mind of man from becoming so delicate as to be affected by the mind or minds of men thousands of miles away? If they can be affected by one another when thousands of miles apart, what will prevent them from communicating with one another though living on different planets? The brain and nerves in the human body are the most perfect electric instruments on this earth, and yet they are susceptible of improvement.

If we see an electric instrument adjusting itself to every variation in the temperature, promptly and accurately, we call it perfect. But if it goes by jerks and jumps, sometimes not moving at all, we do not depend on it. So with the human mind; a perfect mind would be one that instantly recognized right and followed it; one that would change every moment if necessary in order to get on the right side. As we become higher developed mentally, we are easier influenced by reason. On the principle of mental development stands the Infidel; next are what we may call uneducated but tolerably well-posted men; high school and college graduates next—the exceptions are few but worthy of honor. Going on down we find modern preachers, Christian believers generally, statesmen, saloon keepers, and sporting men generally, all in the same grade mentally, and, of course, morally. If you had time you might go down the scale till you struck mud or bottom, and find my test of mental development true in every case. Some time in the near future I will try to expound the law by which the planets were distributed through the solar system. This law will hold good on the earth, also throughout the universe.

TAYLOR, MISS., July 6, 1895.

EDITOR Commercial Appeal: Your editorial in the Commercial Appeal of the 5th, concerning the persecution of Seventh-Day Adventists, for violation of Sunday laws, shows a total misconception of the principle involved. It seems to you harsh and cruel that a man should be punished for worshiping God according to the dictates of his own conscience. Has it never occurred to you that there is a large and increasing class of citizens who, for reasons satisfactory to themselves, have no desire to "worship" anything? And is it not equally as wrong to punish them for the violation of such a law as it is in the case of the Seventh-Day Adventists?

All such statutes are invasions of the equal rights before the law of all citizens, and they should therefore not be modified in the interests of any particular class, but should be abolished entirely. There can be no civil basis for such laws; no one has ever demonstrated or can demonstrate the fact that any act which society punishes as a crime is more or less criminal according to the day on which it occurs, or that any act can be made a crime on one day out of seven, while on the remaining six days it is regarded as not only harmless, but actually promotive of the general welfare.

Plowing, running trains, and publishing newspapers are occupations in which it is usually regarded as highly commendable for men to engage. Why, then, do they become so fraught with danger to the social fabric when it is proposed to carry them on seven days in the week instead of only six?

The hypocrisy of the contention that these laws are merely to secure every one in the enjoyment of one day's rest in seven is evident when we contemplate the ideal day of rest which the Sunday reformers have set up, and which they are pursuing with such zeal. All places of amusement closed, no transportation facilities, no mail, telegraph, or Sunday newspapers; nothing to disturb the holy calm except the clanging of church bells and the echo of the footsteps of the latter-day Puritan as he wends his way to chapel, keeping a sharp look-out the while for such unlucky mortals as may happen to offend his sense of the fitness of things; nothing, in fact, for the weary mortal seeking rest but the churches and the Young Men's Christian Association. The situation of the individual between the devil and the deep blue sea could not be more hopeless!

So long as there is no evidence of a concerted attempt on the part of some people to deprive others of needed rest, we may safely assume that every individual is the best judge of the time necessary for him to consume in the recuperation of his wasted energies. Indeed, so many people are born tired that it would seem a bad policy on the part of the state to encourage in its citizens the habit of resting to any great extent. We may be sure that people will take all the rest necessary for their health without being driven to it by sheriffs and policemen. It would not be difficult to convince any sensible person of this, but unfortunately some people are not sensible when questions affecting their religious prejudices are involved.

They have been so long accustomed to being guided by the voice of Authority, and turning a deaf ear to that of Reason, that they are incapable of seeing the right of any one to reject their dogmas. Hence, when an otherwise law-loving citizen ventures to deny their right to compel him to devote a certain portion of his time to rest, he is at once denounced as an enemy of society, and one who would undermine that most distinctive American institution, the American Sabbath. He must not only be compelled to rest by law, but he must rest on a day and in a manner prescribed by law. So fearful are these self-appointed regulators of society that we will not take enough rest on Sunday to enable us to resume our arduous labors on Monday, that we are even to be deprived of all opportunities for amusement and instruction on that day! Such fanaticism may succeed for a while, but the inevitable reaction will come, and when it does come it will be complete. Doubtless, many people are conscientious in their belief that great evils would follow the secularization of the Christian Sabbath. Such belief, however, does not warrant them in employing force in preserving it. They should learn a lesson from the facts of history as to the effect which follows the use of the "secular arm" in such matters.

Has Christianity any added prestige on account of the horrors of the Inquisition? Is the history of the crusades so inspiring as to encourage modern Knights of the Cross in imitating the methods of the Crusaders in convincing the "Infidel" of the error of his way? Has the number of witches been sensibly diminished by the imprisoning and hanging of a dozen or more at Salem about two centuries ago? Doubtless, about as many are in existence now as could be found at any time previous to that memorable event!

The impossibility of making Christians by such methods would seem to have been fully demonstrated. The strict enforcement of Sunday laws will not be followed by the results hoped for by their most ardent advocates. Men may be imprisoned and punished for violation of such laws, and the only effect will be to cause their injustice to be more universally recognized. Your statement that there are cases where the civil law cannot recognize the right to worship according to the dictates of one's own conscience is correct in exceptional instances. But that has nothing to do with the point at issue. The enforcement of Sunday laws is not a step in the direction of religious liberty, it is a step toward the establishment of religious tyranny.

No one has been found who would abridge the liberty the Adventists enjoy of worshiping on Saturday if they wish. The question of whether they worship or do not worship is not involved. What we have to decide is whether or not they have the right to pursue their ordinary vocations on a day which their neighbors wish kept "holy" for their especial benefit. There can be but one method of reaching a decision on such a question, and that is, to reject the consideration of all claims based on the religious or other prejudices of a particular class of people, and to determine merely whether one citizen invades the rights of another when he works or plays on a day which the other has selected as a day of worship.

This is the correct way of approaching the subject, and if it were adopted the absurdity of Sunday laws would be evident to all, for no one could discover any rights possessed by any one which would be invaded by other people pursuing their usual occupations on any of the seven days of the week.

This would seem to be a good opportunity for a practical application of the Golden Rule, since it is certain that the advocates of Sunday laws would be very much aggrieved if, the conditions being reversed, the Seventh-Day Adventists should decide to establish Saturday as the only day of worship. Science Lesson.

A CURIOUS SPINNER.

Jenny came running in the house with her white apron covered with very curious little red-headed creatures. "Look," she said, "the fences and trees are full of them. What are they?" Yellow in color, with four short yellow brushes on their backs, two black plumes forward, and one backward, of their bodies, with a brownish-black stripe along the top of the back, and a wider one on each side, with bright red heads and two small red knobs on the ninth and tenth segments, they were indeed pretty to look upon.

They were little spinners, or, in other words, caterpillars, creeping slowly along, minding their own business, paying no attention to anybody or anything, and this year they are uncommonly numerous, destroying the leaves of elm, horse-chestnut, plum, apple, and other trees, for they are voracious eaters.

"What do they then, when they are filled up?" inquired Jenny.

"Let us see if we can find out, Jenny," said the sister Grace, who had not to go far to find a handful of cocoons. The caterpillar has made this little bed for himself, spinning the material from his body. What a downy bed it is with three egg-shaped bran-like scales on the top.

"How long will he stay in there?" questioned Jenny.

"He will sleep in his bed, or chrysalis, just eleven days, and then he will come forth a new creature. If a female, there will be no wings, but, if a male, there will be grayish wings, crossed by wavy dark bands on the upper pair, on which will be a black dot, and a tiny white crescent near the outside angle. Its body will be small and slender, with a tufted back, and its wings will be nearly two inches from tip to tip. I said the females had no wings, but on each shoulder of its gray body there can be seen two little scales which would seem to be intended for wings.

"When they awake from their slumbers they meet their mates, and then they lay their eggs on top of the cocoon or on a leaf, rolling it up, covering them carefully with a sticky sort of froth which dries hard in the air. The Germans call these moths streckfussige spinner, the French, pattes etendues, and the English, vaporers moths, because the males go flying about in the day-time, while most other kinds of the moth family only come out nights."

"Do tell more about caterpillars," said Jenny, with wide-open eyes, and eager interest in every feature.

"Well, the caterpillars are the babies of the moths and butterflies, aren't they?" inquired Grace. "They are noted for being great gluttons while they do eat, and are very extravagant in their families. This kind is called the Tussock.

"There is authority for saying that a female moth usually lays from two hundred to five hundred eggs, a thousand of the different species of moths and butterflies would therefore produce on an average three hundred thousand caterpillars. Should one-half this number be females, they will send out into the world forty-five millions of caterpillars in the second and fifty millions in the third generation. We cannot help observing them, if for no other reason than the destruction they bring to vegetation."

"But they are made nicely," suggested Jenny. "Yes, fearfully and wonderfully made. Just as much as a man. They have round bodies, from ten to sixteen legs, with claws or hooks at the ends; a fine little shelly head, coral in color, or brown, with strong jaws at the sides of the mouth that open and shut sidewise. In the center of the under lip is a small tube, which they use in spinning from the fluid of their bodies fine threads which they use in building their homes."

"And are caterpillars really spinners?" and Jenny appeared more mystified than ever.

"Indeed they are, fine spinners," said Grace. "The apple-tree caterpillar and the silkworm make a great deal of silk. Look at your silk pocket-handkerchief, and your pongee gown—the silk-worm made them for you."

"My silk gloves, too?" queried the little maiden.

"Certainly, and your silk stockings. Caterpillars have six eyes, three on each side, but some think they cannot see. I think they can to some extent, though I never examined a caterpillar's eye. I believe I will put one under the microscope," said Grace.

"They change their skins four times before they get their growth, you know. The evolution from a caterpillar into a moth or butterfly is very great. Its shape is altered and wings grow where before there were no wings. Its taste is different, and it no longer likes greens, as green leaves of trees upon which it feasted when a caterpillar, but subsists chiefly on water and the delicate essence of flowers.

"While it is in chrysalis or cocoon is the time to destroy these harmful little spinners if you wish to save the trees. You will find them hidden along on the fences and walls, very thick where there are trees. And you know the green leaves are the lungs of the trees, so to speak, and when destroyed in the summer, the tree cannot breathe, and without breathing it must die."

"The caterpillar does not know what it is doing," protested Grace, as she produced another variety, fat and brown. "Here is a 'woolly bear'—does he do harm also?" The "woolly bear" rolled over in her hand, and seemed to say he would not hurt a tree for all the world.

"The 'woolly bears' are all right, and not numerous enough to do great injury," and Grace explained his passage into a butterfly.

"I 'spose," pondered Jenny, "that God made caterpillars if he made anything, and I told old Deacon Nesbitt so when I saw him just now, going around cutting off the heads of these little spinners with a jackknife. I asked him if God didn't mean for them to live, just the same as he, and if he (God) didn't make the trees for them to have something to eat, too. And he told me to shut my mouth up and go home. Once I caught a butterfly and showed it to him, and he said it was an emblem of the resurrection, and some day we would all be butterflies—that is, flying angels. But wouldn't we have to be caterpillars first? Speak, Grace."

"According to observation we would. Ministers and others often use the butterfly as a symbol of the resurrection, but it is not a good one, for the life of the moth or butterfly is transient. It goes dancing about from flower to flower for only a few days. It accomplishes its mission, and perpetuates its species, when it dies for good and all. It has a happy time while it does live, but when death overtakes it, it is known no more forever."

"I'll tell Deacon Nesbitt that he can't be a butterfly because he isn't a caterpillar," said Jenny, running away, laughing.
S. H. W.

Questions.—What is a cocoon? Of what and how is it made? Describe the transformation of the caterpillar as far as you can. By what name are these moths known to the Germans?—the French?—the English? What are the caterpillars? What is their greatest characteristic? Are the female moths very prolific? Describe the offspring of the moth. Who furnishes material for our silken garments? Tell of the change of diet after the transforming process? When should these creatures be destroyed, if they become pests? What about the leaves of a tree? What can you tell, if anything, of the caterpillar known as the "Woolly bear"? If Deacon Nesbitt believed God made the caterpillar, had he any moral right to destroy it? Is the butterfly a good symbol of the resurrection of the body? If not, why? What is the object of the life of a caterpillar or moth?

A Truth.

Asks a student one day
While seeking a ray
For the journey of life through all the way,
What is a truth,
For age or youth,
That we shall know though Reuben or Ruth;
Which is the light
That guides aright
Through lingering shadows of passing night?

Light up the brain
From electric "main,"
And justice find in her poised domain;
The light doth show
With a steady glow
Wrong from one to another is a fatal blow
That shatters some bark
Of a human heart
That o'er life's sea sails in the dark.

Then back on rebound
Is a deadly wave's sound,
And our own fragil boat, alas! is aground.
Reason, from lofty height,
Looks on the great fight
Of truth with error for victory of right,
And writes on the guideway
Words clear as the day,
"Nothing is wrong that can in no way
Harm man or beast,
In the very least."

Hard Knocks at Christianity.

By R. WHEELER.

This book is just what its title implies—thumping whacks at superstition. It deals with the effect of Christianity on the world, showing what Christians have done to advance their religion and impede the progress of man. It shows that Jesus was a false prophet, that the gospels are not authentic, and that Christianity is a borrowed system of religion. That the Bible is not in accord with Science, that the atonement scheme is futile and foolish, and that religion is not a real benefit to man.

THE BRAIN AND BIBLE;
OR
THE CONFLICT BETWEEN MENTAL SCIENCE AND THEOLOGY.
By EDGAR C. BEALL, M.D.,
with a preface by
R. G. INGERSOLL.
This is the only work of its kind in the literature of Freethought. Its arguments are based upon scientific phrenology, and appeal directly to the reader's sense of logic and love of justice. It is eloquent as well as convincing.
Price, cloth, $1. Address THE TRUTH SEEKER.

By the census of 1890, the above is the value of

Church Property

in the United States.

Should It Be Exempt from Taxation?

REASONS WHY IT SHOULD NOT.

Our pamphlet with this title contains an Argument for Equality of Taxation, and a Statement of Facts, giving, from the Census of 1890, the value by Denominations, of Church Property in the United States and in the several States and Territories and in all Cities having 25,000 or more inhabitants; so arranged as to show at a glance the relative standing as to wealth of the leading Denominations and Sects, all comparisons being based upon official figures. This pamphlet is the only one of the kind published. In no other work are the facts, figures, and arguments to be found. The figures, being derived from the Government Census of 1890, will not be superseded until the census of 1900 shall have been completed—probably about eight years hence. The arguments are unanswerable and will have the dew of morning on them so long as the injustices of church exemption is suffered to exist.

By single copies the price is 15 cents, but as the work is published specially for distribution by those who favor justice in taxation the following reductions are made:

Ten copies.....	$1.00
Fifty copies.....	4.50
One hundred copies.....	8.00
Larger quantities at special rates.

400 Years OF Freethought

By Samuel Porter Putnam

Large Octavo, 1165 pp., Gilt Sides and Back, Marbled Edges. $5.

With The Truth Seeker for One Year, $6.50.

141 FULL-PAGE PORTRAITS!

Of the Most Eminent Freethinkers, of the Past Four Hundred Years.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY announced in October that this superb work was at last ready for delivery. It had been in preparation for so long that some of the subscribers were getting a little impatient and wondering when they would have the opportunity to see for themselves whether it possessed all the merits claimed for it by the publishers. They did not realize the magnitude of the work, and that the six months' delay in getting it out was due to the fact that they were to have fifty per cent more reading than they had been promised and nearly three times as many portraits. Such was the case, however. Instead of six hundred pages of letter-press there are nearly nine hundred, and the fifty portraits promised in the prospectus have multiplied to one hundred and forty-one! Considering the fact that the illustrations are the most costly part of the book—as undoubtedly to many they will also be the most attractive—and properly estimating the expense of the extra three hundred pages of text, it is evident that the subscriber received about one hundred per cent more for his $5 than was guaranteed to him. Well, the nearly eleven hundred copies of the volume subscribed for were sent out, and now we know what the recipients think of their investment. Judging by the letters that reach this office, they are not only satisfied—more than satisfied—but surprised and delighted that they got such a bargain.

As for the subject matter of FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT, it covers nearly every phase of progress and development and presents them in such orderly sequence as to give the best possible picture of human evolution. In Part First we have Freethought as a manifestation and influence; in Part Second, as an organized force. With this history are given sketches of the lives of the men and women who have taken part in the movement. It unites the past and the present. It is a world book and a home book. It fulfils the promise of its inception, and is the most magnificent work ever issued by the Freethought Press.

Price, $5. With "The Truth Seeker" One Year, $6.50.

WITH DAUGHTER'S BABE UPON HIS KNEES.

A new edition of that splendid prose poem "Life," by "the prince of orators," Col. R. G. Ingersoll. It is larger and better than the old edition, and can be framed or placed upon the table as an ornament. In the center of the card appear the portraits of the Colonel and the baby, surrounded by the prose poem, which has been truthfully described as, "one of the masterpieces of the orator and poet, who now, as far as we know, stands alone in the living world." It will make a delightful present, and will be a souvenir not only of intellectual greatness, but of artistic workmanship. It is printed on heavy board, gilt boveled edge. The size is 12x16 inches, and the price only 75 cents, post-paid.

Gems of Thought.

THE same sentiment which leads us to maintain our own rights, leads us, by its sympathetic excitement, to respect the rights of our neighbors. A state in which every one is jealous of his natural claims is not therefore a litigious state, because if there is a due fellow-feeling there is of necessity a diminished tendency to aggression.—Herbert Spencer.

I THINK that one may say that it is only the commonplace writer who "clothes" his thoughts at all. In the true poet, in the vital writer, the thought and the words are one—they cannot be separated; but the would-be poet always dresses up his thought, always selects the prettiest words and fancies, and hence never gives us a sense of the real, but of the artificial, the made-up.—John Burroughs.

THE teachers may be anxious to avoid all sectarianism; yet, being brought up to regard what are called the great fundamental truths of Christianity as beyond dispute, they naturally inculcate dogmas that are the very root of sectarianism. They know that the reading of the Bible is insisted on, not as a part of ancient literature, but as the "word of God." It is demanded as religious teaching, and notions of reverence and submission are inculcated in regard to it which would be out of place in regard to any other book.—J. M. Wheeler.

For my own part, I conclude that the question of artistic degeneracy is not to be determined by a man of Nordan's methods and motive, by one so unable to distinguish between what is due to art and what to insanity; and on the general question raised respecting the meaning of egotism and emotionalism, I conclude that, in an age when the forces of democracy are working to increase individuality on the one hand, and the feeling of humanity on the other, these still tend upward. I can not doubt the course of history or lose faith in the upward movement of the universe. It is easier to question the results of morbid psychology.—Oscar Lovell Triggs.

HE [Voltaire] found that Theodosius called a council at Constantinople in 381, by which it was decided that the Holy Ghost proceeded from the Father—that Theodosius, the younger, assembled a council at Ephesus in 431, that declared the Virgin Mary to be the Mother of God—that the Emperor Marcian called another council at Chalcedon in 451, that decided that Christ had two wills—that Pognatius called another in 680, that declared that Christ had two natures to go with his two wills—and that in 1274, at the council of Lyons, the important fact was found that the Holy Ghost "proceeded," not only from the Father, but also from the Son at the same time. So it took about 1,300 years to find out a few things that had been revealed by an infidel God to his infallible church.—Ingersoll.

THE FELLOWSHIP OF WHITMAN.

O good Gray Poet! thou hast never died!
Though in yon silent vault we saw thee turned,
And back to dust thy matchless form be turned,
Yet faithful comrades have thee at their side.
The pedant and the sons of cant deride Thee still; the scornful eyebrow waits to lift
When loving insight owns thy stintless gift
Of song and soul to man. But in the tide
Of fellowship that laves the utmost shore Whereon men dwell, and pulses in the veins
Of brotherhood, thou livest more and more.
Thy voice is sounding in the variant strains
Of earth's great music, in the noisy roar
Of passion, love's sweet note, and murmuring pains.

What life that ever lived or died, what tears
That ever man or woman shed, what thrill
Of joy, what sins of weakness, crimes of will,
What visions of the holy, deep-eyed seers,
What chime or choral or symphonic spheres,
That thy great heart hath never understood,
Nor fused to Beauty with the solvent Good?

Thine is the heritage of eldest years;
Prophetic, on the topmost heights of time, Thou speakest forth the gospel of the stars,
That weds the atoms to the worlds sublime;
And earth, still harried with her woes and wars,
Shall listen yet! For thou the loftier rime
Hast built, which blindness, hate, nor envy mars.

—John Herbert Clifford, in Conservator.

AN ANTIDOTE ANALYZED. Reply to a Christian who had attacked Freethinkers, and Exposing the Inconsistency of Christians generally. H. C. Luse.

BIBLE TEMPERANCE. Showing that Liquor Drinking is Commended, Defended, and Enjoined by the Bible. Edwin C. Walker. CHRISTIANITY A REWARD FOR CRIME. Authenticated by the Bible. O. B. Whitford, M.D.

DID MAN FALL? Is the Garden of Eden a Fact? Israel W. Groh.

EPIDEMIC DELUSIONS. A Lecture by Frederic R. Marvin, M.D. Giving reasonable reasons for Religious and other Delusions.

FALSE CLAIMS OF THE CHURCH. John E. Remsburg's most noted work, and one of the most effective ever written by any Freethinker.

FIRST EPISTLE OF BENNETT THE APOSTLE TO THE TRUTH SEEKERS.

Written while journeying in and near the land of Yahweh. Containing the best moral instructions of the world from the great teachers of the former ages. D. M. Bennett.

THE GIANT DELUSION. A paper read before the Freethought International Congress at Chicago. One of Otto Wettstein's fraternal attacks on Spiritualism.

THE GLORY OF INFIDELITY. To which is added a poem on Thomas Paine. One of Samuel P. Putnam's most brilliant lectures. Every Christian who asks the idiotic question, "What Has Infidelity Done?" should be induced to read this book, if he has to be paid to do it.

HOW CAN WE BE SAVED? Was Jesus Supernaturally Conceived, and did he Rise from the Dead? Israel W. Groh.

INGERSOLL AND JESUS. Showing how the two agree. A poem by Samuel P. Putnam.

THE LIMITATIONS OF TOLERANCE. A discussion between Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, Hon. Frederic R. Coudert, Ex-Gov. Stewart L. Woodford, before the Nineteenth Century Club of New York. "Each man has the same right to express to the whole world his ideas that the rest of the world have to express their thoughts to him." Colonel Ingersoll maintains this, the others deny it. Mr. Coudert is a Roman Catholic, Mr. Woodford a Protestant.

MATERIALISM: Its History, and Its Influence Upon Society. Dr. Louis Buchner.

MIRACLES AND MIRACLE WORKERS. A Consideration of the Marvels and Miracles of the New Testament. One of John Peck's best books.

MOSES BEFORE THE COURT, or The Forgery of the Old Testament. Dedicated to the Clergy. H. J. Seignuret, M.D.

THE NEW GOD. "It is an open secret that man has always made his Gods. They exist in and through him, as the image exists in and through the mirror. Take away man and you take away God—the image vanishes." This pamphlet, therefore, is a consideration of what kind of a God man should make. Samuel P. Putnam.

ORTHODOXY. A lecture by Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll, and one of that great man's best. The subjects considered are: Orthodox Religion Dying Out, Religious Deaths and Births, The Religion of Reciprocity, Mohammed, The Destruction of Art, The Discovery of America, Copernicus and Kepler, Charles Darwin, Special Providence, The Latest Creed, God as a Governor, The Love of God, The Fall of Man, The Atonement, The Second Birth, Insurrection, The Reign of Truth and Love, The Wars It Brought, The Resurrection, The Judgment Day, Pious Evasions, "No Bible, No Civilization," Miracles of the New Testament, The Ascension, Casting out Devils, Necessity of Belief, Eternal Punishment, Some Who Are Damned, What I Believe, Immortality. This lecture is on the famous text, "The Clergy know that I know that they do not know."

PERSONAL EXISTENCE AFTER DEATH IMPROBABLE. L. R. Smith.

PROCEEDINGS OF THE CIVIL RIGHTS MASS MEETING AT LINCOLN HALL, WASHINGTON. Being the Speeches of Hon. FREDERICK DOUGLASS and Col. ROBERT G. INGERSOLL on the Decision of the United States Court that the Civil Rights Act is Unconstitutional. Fifty-three large octavo pages, of which Colonel Ingersoll's speech occupies 38 pages.

PULPIT, PEW, AND CRADLE. So long as the Pulpit speaks to believing Pews composed chiefly of mothers, the cradle will be rocked by ghosts and the race will remain on its knees to a devil of its own creation and to a God who is powerless against him. One of Helen Gardner's brightest efforts.

THE RELIGION OF HUMANITY BETTER THAN ETERNAL PUNISHMENT. M. Babcock.

RELIGIOUS PROBLEMS. One of L. K. Washburn's best lectures, and it is, like all of his, very good.

THE ROARING LION ON THE TRACK. One of M. Babcock's comical sermons.

SCIENCE vs. RELIGION, or The Conflict Between Reason and Superstition. T. O. Widdicombe.

ST. MATTHEW BEFORE THE COURT. Presenting the evidence of the forgery of his alleged gospel. H. J. Seignuret.

SISTER LUCY AND HER AWFUL DISCLOSURES REGARDING NEW HALL CONVENT. Showing that Convents are inimical to chastity, virtue, and freedom.

SPIRITUALISM FROM A MATERIALISTIC STANDPOINT. B. F. Underwood. Written before Mr. Underwood joined the Psychic Researchers.

THUMBSCREW AND RACK. Torture Implements Employed in the 15th and 16th centuries for the promulgation of Christianity. Being the Nuremberg Collection, with specimens from the Holy Inquisition. 28 pictures. The descriptions and reflections by George E. MacDonald.

VICTOR HUGO'S ORATION ON VOLTAIRE, delivered on the one hundredth anniversary of Voltaire's death. Translated by James Parton, author of the Life of Voltaire. To which are added the three great poems of Goethe, George Eliot, and Longfellow.

WAS CHRIST CRUCIFIED? Austin Bierbower. A lawyer's consideration of the evidence of that alleged event.

WAS JESUS INSANE? A consideration of Christ's alleged acts which would lead one to that conclusion. T. K. Washburn.

WHY DON'T HE LEND A HAND? And other Agnostic Poems. Samuel P. Putnam. The title poem is perhaps the most popular of Mr. Putnam's many poems, and a great many editions of it have been called for. The other poems are: The Golden Age, The Ideal and the Real, Not Dead, but Living, Fruition, Hope, Thomas Paine, Nature's Gospel, Address to Deity, and the short poem so often recited with great effect by Charles Watts, Give Us Light.

WILL THE COMING MAN WORSHIP GOD? B. F. Underwood; written before Mr. Underwood joined the Psychic Researchers.

WOMAN: FOUR CENTURIES OF PROGRESS. A lecture delivered at the Freethinkers' International Congress at Chicago. Considering: The Cause of Woman's Subjugation, The Canon Law and Its Effects Upon Her, Theology Never Helpful to Woman, Invention Woman's Friend, Freethought the Benefactor of Woman. Susan H. Wixon.

WOMAN: HER PAST AND PRESENT, HER RIGHTS AND WRONGS. A lecture delivered before the Woman Suffrage Association of Denver, Col., by B. F. Underwood.

Any one of the above for ten cents, and twelve for a dollar.

In the nature of things,

SAYS

ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

"In the nature of things there can be no evidence to establish the claim of inspiration." Such is the text of the Colonel's new lecture entitled

All About the Holy Bible

Just published in a large and handsome pamphlet. Price 25 cents. Address The Truth Seeker Co., New York.

The Great Ingersoll Controversy

Containing the famous Christmas Sermon by Colonel Ingersoll, the protests thereby evoked from the ministers who think they own this country and all therein, and Colonel Ingersoll's replies to the same. A finely gotten up pamphlet. Price, 25 cents.

Liberty for Man, Woman, and Child

"Reading this lecture," remarked a friend the other day, "will make men better; for if a man reads it one night on his way home, the next night he will take along some oranges or something to his family." This lecture is gotten up in the handsome style of "Voltaire" and "Lincoln," and has as a frontispiece a fine photo-engraving of the Colonel and both his grandchildren, Eva and Robert, the little fellow upon his knee, and Eva in her high chair. It is a pretty picture, and the Colonel's millions of friends will take pleasure in it. In this pamphlet is also the Colonel's Tribute to His Brother, which so many have desired to have in convenient form. Price, 25 cents.

VOLTAIRE

"Voltaire was the greatest man of his century, and did more to free the human race than any other of the sons of men." A lecture by INGERSOLL, with portrait of Voltaire. A handsome pamphlet. Every Freethinker will surely want it. Price, 25 cents.

LINCOLN

This is Colonel INGERSOLL's great lecture, printed in a handsome pamphlet, and containing the Century's famous portrait of Lincoln—said to be the best extant. Price, 25 cents.

SHAKSPERE

"An intellectual ocean, whose waves touched all the shores of thought." A lecture by INGERSOLL, with likeness of Shakspeare from the Kesselstadt death mask. Price, 25 cents.

Travels in Faith.

By CAPT. ROBERT C. ADAMS.

Being the story of his mental journey from orthodoxy to Rationalism.

Price, paper, 25 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

Not for Parsons.

PATRON: "Wun Lung, is it true that many of the Japanese have become Christians?" Chinese Laundryman: "Me sabe thatee so. See how they fightee!"—New York Weekly.

MAMMA: "Why didn't you ask God in your prayer to make your brother well?" Robbie: "'Cause then I'd hav to go on wearing his old clothes made over."—Chicago Inter-Ocean.

BINGO (sternly): "Who hav you been playing with to-day, Bobbie?" Bobbie: "The gambler's little boy, sir." Bingo: "Oh, all right. I didn't know but you had been playing with the minister's son."—Life.

MINISTER: "And so you say your little prayer every night before you go to bed? That's right. And now tell me why do you do that?" Little Ethel: "Because mamma says she'll spank me if I don't."—Somerville Journal.

MASON: "Why does Jason prefer taking a walk on Fifth avenue on Sunday morning to going to church?" Payson: "He says he likes to read sermons in stones rather than to listen to sermons from sticks."—New York Herald.

MRS. NEWBORN (patronizingly): "Were any of your ancestors men of note, Mr. Cynic?" Mr. C.: "Yes, madam, I should say so. One of them was the most famous admiral of his day, and commanded the allied forces of the world." Mrs. N. (with altered tone of deep respect): "Is it possible, Mr. C. I! And what was his name?" "Noah, madam."—Life.

THE Reverend Mr. Harps: "Johnny, I am sorry to hear that you have been fighting with Willy Thumps again. Suppose something should happen so that you never see him again till you meet him in heaven; what would you do then?" Johnny Thickenek: "I'd yank one of his wings off, pound him over the head with it, and drive his blamed crown down over his ears till they'd hav to file it in two to get it off."—Puck.

At a prayer-meeting in a small town near Syracuse recently, an illiterate but good old man made the following prayer: "O Lord, thou knowest that we are thankful to thee that our souls are safe from the fire that quencheth not. If a man lose his horse thou knowest that he can buy another; if he lose his house thou knowest that he can build another; if he lose his wife thou knowest that he can get another, but if he lose his soul—good-by, John."—Moslem World.

A WOMAN I know has a daughter, and the other day she undertook to explain the immortality of the soul to her. A neighbor had died, and the child was much interested in the funeral. Her questions were innumerable, and at last her mother, as I said, proceeded to explain the matter to her. Margery is a bright little midget, and listened attentively. "Now, do you think you understand?" asked the mother, after a dissertation as simple as could be made. "Oh, yes," answered Margery, glibly; "I understand. Mr. Smith is dead, but he isn't really there at all. His body is there, but (triumphantly) his insides are in heaven."

THE story is told of a preacher who came to a newspaper man and said: "You editors dare not tell the truth. If you did you could not live; your newspaper would be a failure." The editor replied: "You are right; and the minister who will at all times and under all circumstances tell the whole truth about his members, alive or dead, will not occupy his pulpit more than one Sunday, and then he will find it necessary to leave town in a hurry. The press and the pulpit go hand in hand with whitewash brushes and pleasant words, magnifying little virtues into big ones. The pulpit, the pen, and the gravestone are the great saint-making triumvirate."—Boston Post.

MR. TSUI KWO YIN, the Chinese minister, a short time ago called at the state department, accompanied by the official interpreter of the legation, to make inquiry of Secretary Gresham concerning the publication in the newspapers of a batch of alleged telegrams about events in China. The minister had no such information as was contained in the published despatches, and neither had the state department. An investigation was made, but it was found that the telegrams were very old ones that had in some unaccountable way been published as live news matter. Secretary Gresham attempted to explain this to the minister, but with rather poor success. "Then the secretary said, a trifle snappishly: 'They are fabrications—lies; the persons who published the despatches are liars.' 'Humph! liars,' repeated Tsui Kwo Yin in his deliberative, impassive way; 'they would make good missionaries.'"—New York Sun.

The Glory of Infidelity

WITH A POEM ON Thomas Paine

By SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

This is one of the best of Mr. Putnam's works, and no Freethinker or Infidel should be without it, to meet the claims of Christians that Infidelity is an inglorious philosophy.

THE ELIXIR OF LIFE

is not in magic potions, "specifics" or electric clasp-trap, but only in Wisdom—THE SCIENCE OF HEALTH. Wise men study nature, shun disease, learn to maintain vigor and regain it by reading the most complete book of Medical, Social, Sexual Science, by an eminent physician of 35 years experience. The "old, original, standard" work, endorsed by all, invited by many, equalled by none. Inspired by wish to aid humanity, it has providentially saved thousands. Its essays on marriage, parentage, adaptation, marital failures, etc., are of inestimable value to all now married or who ever expect to be. The last edition has 1,000 pages, 8 colored charts of vital organs, 200 wood cuts, 21 chromos showing origin of life—development of man. APPENDIX has over 200 Recipes. Only $1.50 by Mail; Circulars Free.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait-painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—[Freethinkers' Magazine.]

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of this volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—[Boston Investigator.]

AT ABOUT ONE-HALF VALUE.

A small farm of 10 acres 86 perches, located within one and a half miles of Media county seat and within four miles of Chester, Pa., on the Delaware river. Several springs of soft water, good timber growing on the place, some choice apple and pear trees in fruiting condition. House and barn on the place, but are old buildings. Within five minutes walk of the railroad station, 9 miles from Philadelphia. Trolley line between Media and Chester, with less than five minutes walk.

The place is specially well located for a florist, and it would be a fine summer residence for one who would put a modern house on it. Eight years ago the land adjoining sold for $618 per acre, and no land near it has sold as low as that since. Several smaller places have sold at $1,000 per acre. The land slopes toward the southwest, overlooking beautiful woodland scenery.

THE PLACE CAN BE BOUGHT FOR $3,500.

SOME MORE MISFITS—WHY SOME RELIGIOUS PIGMIES ARE AFRAID OF BEING ETERNALLY LOST.

Special NEW SUBSCRIBER Offer.

We wish, for two good and valid reasons, to greatly extend the circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER. First, we want its influence for good and its efforts for greater liberty of thought to be more widely distributed, and consequently more effective. Second, we want more subscribers to help pay its expenses and enable us to do more work. And we wish to emphasize both of these reasons. Our present subscribers can do a great deal for us if they will, and to get them to aid us we are willing to reward them; we therefore make this SPECIAL NEW SUBSCRIBER OFFER:

To any subscriber now on our list who will get a new name for the list for one year, sending us three dollars for the same, we will send free a copy of the FREETHINKER'S PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK, in board covers (price TWO DOLLARS).

And to anyone whose name is not now on our list we make this offer: Send us three dollars for the paper one year, and we will send you free the PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK.

The pictures in the FREETHINKER'S PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK were made and the text written to show the absurdity and untruthfulness of the Church's claim to being a divine and beneficent institution, and to reveal the abuses of a union of church and state. It has 185 Full-page Illustrations, with copious citations of Facts, History, Statistics, and Opinions of Scholars to maintain the argument of the Artist. The Designs are by WATSON HESTON and include a portrait of the designer. The pictures are classified as follows: Of those representing Uncle Sam and the Priests there are 16; representing The Church Robbing the People, 2; Thanksgiving, 3; Sabbath Laws, 6; Children and the Church, 11; Woman and the Church, 10; The Church and Thomas Paine, 6; Studies in Natural History, 4; The Bible and Science, 2; The Clergy and Their Flocks, 15; Piety in Our Penitentiaries, 1; The Atonement Scheme, 4; The Lord and His Works, 4; Prayer, 2; The Creeds, 10; Christians and Mohammedans, 1; Samples of Christianity's Work, 2; Missionaries, 5; The Lord's Instruments, 1; Bible Doctrines and Their Results, 25; Church and Slavery, 1; Priests and Politics, 2; Ireland and the Church, 4; Church Ideas of Civilization, 2; Uses of the Cross, 1; Unkind Reflections on the Church, 4; Persecutions by the Church, 9; Some Allegories, 12; Heaven, 3; Hell, 6; Miscellaneous, 7

This offer cannot apply to renewals. Premiums for them can be found on the second page of this issue. We are giving five dollars' worth for three in this offer, and there is no profit in it except that we shall get many renewals of these subscriptions; the subscribers will also, probably, buy a few books from time to time, and the small margin on them may make us whole. Induce your neighbor to subscribe, and so get the book for yourself. Or, if you are not now a subscriber, send us three dollars and get both paper and book—FIVE DOLLARS' WORTH FOR THREE DOLLARS.

Read what the papers and people have said of the book and see if it is not worth while to make a strong effort to obtain it. The book has had a large run; five thousand copies have been sold, and everyone who paid two dollars for it says it is worth a good deal more. Now we are giving it away, and you can get a copy if you will. Do not delay, but get it now.

What a New Subscriber, Who Has Received His Pictorial Text-Book, Says of It.

LAMAR, Mo., May 8, 1895.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: The "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book" is received, and after a careful examination of the work I unhesitatingly pronounce it one of the most impressive Freethought works ever issued from the press. It will indeed "corner the parson" and all his flock, and I shall take great pleasure in showing the book to my orthodox friends. As a reference book it is invaluable, and it should find a place in every Freethinker's library.

When Renewing Your Subscription, Take Advantage of These Good Offers.

For $6.50 we will send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year ($3) and S. P. Putnam's "Four Hundred Years of Freethought" ($5). Large Octavo, 1150 pages, gilt sides and back, marbled edges—the most magnificent work ever issued by the Freethought Press. 140 Half Tone Engravings of the Prominent Freethinkers of the past four centuries.

The object of this work is to present the Course of Freethought throughout the Civilized World from the time of Columbus and Bruno to the time of Ingersoll. It is a radical Historic Record of the greatest developments of the human race. It reveals Freethought as an intellectual, moral, literary, social, industrial, and political movement. It shows what Freethought is in itself, how manifold are its influences, and with what promise we can hail its future triumph. "FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT" embraces the most illustrious pages of human history, adorned with the brightest genius, radiant with the most splendid poetry, rich with the greatest inventions and discoveries, and ennobled with freedom's most shining advance. Nothing can be more interesting or more inspiring to the pioneer workers of to-day, to those who are still in the van for human rights and progress. No Liberal can afford to be without this book. It contains the greatest thoughts and the greatest deeds of the greatest men in one harmonious and magnificent whole, a vivid picture of man's sublimest evolution, with the added glory of woman's emancipation from the chains and slavery of a barbaric church.

Darwin and After Darwin

An Exposition of the Darwinian Theory.
By GEORGE J. ROMANES.

A systematic Exposition of what may be termed the Darwinism of Darwin, and intended to be of service to the general reader rather than to professional naturalists.
Mr. Romanes is well known as one of the most interesting of English writers upon evolution, besides ranking with Professor Huxley in scientific knowledge and ability. And this is a part of his conclusion regarding the great subject of Design, to which the church so often refers: "Thus whether we look to the facts of adaptation or to those of beauty, everywhere throughout organic nature we meet with abundant evidence of natural causation, while nowhere do we meet with any independent evidence of supernatural design. Adaptation and beauty are alike receiving their explanation at the hands of a purely mechanical philosophy. . . . All nature has thus been transformed before the view of the present generation in a manner and to an extent that has never before been possible; and inasmuch as the change which has taken place has taken place in the direction of naturalism, and this to the extent of rendering the mechanical interpretation of nature universal, it is no wonder if the religious mind has suddenly awakened to a new and a terrible force in the words of its traditional enemy—Where is now thy God?"

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with a little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroine. The narrative is, in the main, a history of a working-girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business-men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrites. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world.

Last Chance to Obtain a Rare Book.

David Friedrich Strauss's "Life of Jesus Critically Examined" was first published in two volumes for $9. The edition ran out, and another was issued in one volume for $4.50. This edition is almost exhausted, less than fifty copies being in existence. Of what are left we have obtained a share, and can furnish them postpaid at the last price, $4.50. They will not last long, and we advise those of our friends who want a copy to send at once. When these are gone there will be no more to be had. This edition is translated from the fourth German edition by George Eliot, and contains 784 large octavo pages of solid reading, very clearly printed. It is unnecessary to say to students that this is a very valuable work, one which the church wishes had never been written, but which it cannot controvert.

Heterodox Mr. Clark.

What Infidels these Christians are! Here is Rev. Francis E. Clark, founder and president of the Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor, requesting the women assembled in the great tent at Boston to remove their hats and bonnets, as it would enable them to better stand the heat. But has the reverend gentleman forgotten the exceedingly great virtue of self-sacrifice? And does he not know that his fetish book commands woman to remain covered in church? In First Corinthians, Eleventh chapter, he will find this, along with other pious nonsense, that should make woman the willing slave of the church forever:

"For I would have you know that the head of every man is Christ, and the head of the woman is the man, and the head of Christ is God. Every man praying or prophesying, having his head covered, dishonoreth his head. But every woman that prayeth or prophesieth with her head uncovered dishonoreth her head, for that is even all one as if she were shaven. For if the woman be not covered, let her also be shorn; but if it be a shame for a woman to be shorn or shaven, let her be covered. For a man indeed ought not to cover his head, forasmuch as he is the image and glory of God; but the woman is the glory of the man. For the man is not of the woman, but the woman of the man. Neither was the man created for the woman, but the woman for the man."

Rev. Mr. Clark has no right to pick around in the Bible and sort out the commands of God that he wants to enforce and then insolently trample on those which he does not like. He is not a reform police commissioner, but a Christian minister, and Christian ministers believe in and obey every word in the Bible. Of course they do. Only Infidels reject what does not suit them.

"The Church Is in Politics."

One of the most prominent workers for "Christian prohibition" (what a slap in the face of the Bible!) is John G. Woolley. He was one of the star speakers at the recent "National Conference of Reforms" at Prohibition Park, Staten Island. What kind of a "reformer" he is may be judged from the fact that the Christian Statesman—for God in the Constitution, now and forever—publishes his speech entire. Mr. Woolley is aggressive and scheming in method, turgid and flamboyant in style. As a specimen of his work, take this, the opening paragraph of his address:

"I have been listening to the voices of the century, from the daybreak, when all the morning birds of liberty were singing, to the eventide, when the vampire bat of the world's worst slavery scents the night in its hiding and flaps its skinny wings into the open, glancing like a foul suspicion hither and thither across the weary quiet of the gloaming from darkness to darkness."

The brand of "liberty" that this soaring orator champions is to be inferred from his party affiliations, saying nothing of his specific declarations that the plan for political union of "reformers" that he fathers "honors the church and enforces the Sabbath." Here is another gem from Mr. Woolley's exordium:

"To him whose poor cosmogony affords no god all progress is but a curious paralysis, and every sound—from childbed cry to deathbed hallelujah—parts of one universal discord, shot with chance harmonies. But it is a dull ear and eye that cannot catch in the storm and stress of these tremendous days enough of luminiferous melody to prove that all these whimsical and terrific changes are of the overture to orderly and matchless symphonies in preparation."

We should say that "luminiferous melody" is particularly good, but still we fear that a victim dying by inches of one of God's cancers would decidedly prefer not to furnish the minor notes of woe in that celestial "overture." Once more the entertaining Mr. Woolley:

"For the inexorable love of the Father abideth, and as yon mighty river bears on its quiet bosom bubbles breathed up from scaly reptils burrowing in its underlying ooze, so Jehovah swings the world along its brightening orbit with all the swirl and suck of its financial maelstroms, whirling off from red-tongued hells of social cruelty hot but ineffectual nebulae that keep the mystery of double motion until they cool and symmetrize into the satellites we call reforms, and fly back self-won and finished into the wrong-wrung but winning staple, stable social order of the world."

We haven't time to study that all out, but still we must hastily say in passing that somehow "inexorable" doesn't appear to be just the right adjective with which to qualify love, though it may seem all right to Mr. Woolley when contemplating the "tender mercies" of Jehovah. We can heartily appreciate the orator's likening of the "reforms" he advocates to "bubbles breathed up from scaly reptils burrowing in underlying ooze," though why he instituted such a comparison we are utterly at a loss to understand. But whatever may have been his motif in calling our attention to the fact, it is certain that those "reforms," like the bubbles mentioned, are foul and ephemeral. Carping critics may also say that a flowing river is scarcely a type of the "wrong-wrung but winning staple, stable social order of the world;" they may point out that a river, constantly moving under the impulse of wind and tide and the currents of inflowing streams, is not particularly "stable," but such triflers deserve and undoubtedly will receive no consideration from Christian reformers.

Mr. Woolley proposes that all believers in injected righteousness shall "combine politically in the name of Jesus Christ the Conqueror, and form an inter-partisan order of independent voters whose entire scope shall be the head of the ticket, in federal, state, judicial, and municipal elections." In other words, the first work of these "reformers" is to elect the executive officers in the nation, the state, and the cities, and enforce existing laws that make for despotism. The present "reform administration" in this city is the type of what they want everywhere. After they have the people in a sufficiently subdued state of mind through the enforcement of the laws now on the statute books, they expect to elect the legislatures, Congress, and the other law-making bodies, and finish up the job of reform in short order, establishing liberty—for themselves—"in all the land." Mr. Woolley illustrates the working of his patent scheme by bringing to the polls four "Christian voters" belonging to different parties. This is the procedure and the result:

"Neither asks either anything, but each takes our executive paper, affixes it to his ticket, hands it to the judges of election, and remains a Republican, a Democrat, a Populist, a Prohibitionist, and best of all—a man. And lo! the church is in politics with four men and no quarrel instead of one man [the Prohibitionist] and three quarrels."

The italics are Mr. Woolley's. He supposes some one to object that this is a plan for a new political party, and he answers, "It is—a new clean party built on Jesus Christ." Was it Jesus who said, "My kingdom is not of this world?"

Were the Decorations Sectarian Symbols?

The New York Times is a quite able paper, and it is often our pleasure to quote some very sensible arguments from its editorial columns. But occasionally it employs a clergyman or divinity student to write its editorials. We have no confidential information to this effect, but no other conclusion is possible after reading the editorials themselves.

When the Christian Endeavor convention was held in Boston the citizens and authorities did their best to make the delegates welcome, and the symbols of the Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor, mingling with the national colors, were seen everywhere. The Public Garden is one of the most beautiful spots in the city, and is a place that attracts stranger and resident alike. But on Sunday, owing to the bigotry of the Park Commissioners or others in authority, it is not allowable to use the swan and row boats on the lake, although the electric and horse cars rumble and clatter by in the streets. It is likely that the managers think that the use of the boats on Sunday would be a concession to the spirit of sinful pleasure for the pleasure's sake. Any way, the same motives that dominate in the matter here adverted to appear to have dominated when the gardeners were preparing for the reception of the Christian Endeavorers. The flower-beds were so arranged as to form various ecclesiastical devices. At the principal entrance was a cross, and scattered about the grounds were a cross and crown, cross and anchor, cross and sword, cross and Bible, with inscriptions such as "By This Sign We Conquer," "Welcome, Christian Endeavorers," and "For Christ and His Church." Some of these devices were linked with the coat of arms of the state of Massachusetts.

Now it appears that there is in Boston an organization calling itself "The New Brotherhood." Unfortunately, we are not informed as to its principles and purposes, but, judging alone from its vigorous protest against this misuse of the Public Garden, we are led to think that its members have some saving common sense. The Times reaches just the opposite conclusion from the same evidence. The writers of the protest recognize that it might be no more than courteous to extend a welcome to the visitors, presumably on the ground that they are, in a certain sense, the guests of the city, as would be the delegates to a political convention or a scientific congress. But beyond this, neither the municipality nor any of its departments has a right to go. The tax-payers are of all churches and of no church, and hence the city cannot rightfully use their money to teach the dogmas or otherwise magnify the power of any division of any church or any great world religion itself. "The New Brotherhood" appear to have clearly recognized this fundamental truth, for the protest says that this decorating of the Public Garden "is open to the most serious objections, as in conflict with the true standard of civic rights and religious liberty," and it declares that the devices named are "of a theological and sectarian character." We do not see how a person of fair intelligence and reasonable acquaintance with the Constitution of the United States and the principles of religious liberty could deny the truth of either of these propositions, but the Times does deny the truth of both, and sneers at the authors of the protest, growing very ironical and sarcastic in its would-be witty comments. Anent the protest, it says:

"Upon the whole, this announcement does not suggest the belief that the 'New Brotherhood' is a powerful and valuable agent for the public weal. It does not appear to have the amount of corporate sense necessary to that end."

We are not concerned to defend the "New Brotherhood" as a society, but must unqualifiedly indorse the position it takes in the matter under discussion. The arguments which the Times quotes from its protest are sound, and the New York daily has neither the "corporate" nor any other sort of sense sufficient to answer them. It finds it easy to be satirical and to jeer at the society, but it has not attempted to advance any arguments in support of its assumption that the city of Boston had any constitutional right or was in equity justified in taking the tax-payers' money for propagating Protestant Christianity. The objections would have been equally hard to dispose of if the city had acted in the same way toward a Catholic convention or a convention of Infidels or Jews. The Times knows this as well as we do, or, if it does not, its manager should hire a new editor. Again:

"There is no denying that the devices and the inscriptions were 'theological,' but there is not the slightest evidence that they were 'sectarian.' Of course, you may make a provocation out of almost anything. Some people in Boston have managed to stir up a riot with an emblem intrinsically so inoffensive as a 'Little Red School-house.'"

This is the merest trifling. "Intrinsically" the "Little Red School-house" is not a religious symbol. That it is being made such by Protestant bigots and as such attacked by Catholic bigots is very much to be regretted. But the cross and crown, the cross and Bible, and they separately, are intrinsically religious symbols, and, as such, are necessarily sectarian for the one and ample reason that that which they symbolize and teach is not accepted as divine truth by all the people of the world nor by all the citizens of Boston. It is an utter paradox to say that something which is theological is not sectarian. What is theological is sectarian, inevitably. Will the Times point to a single theological postulate in all the religions of the world that is universally accepted? And if a dogma is not universally accepted, is it not a sectarian dogma? By the census of 1890 the Schwenkfeldian church had three hundred and six communicants. It is a sect. The Catholic church had 6,257,871 communicants. It is a sect. The combined Christian church had 20,618,307 communicants, including the Jews, who should be excluded. It is a sect. Among the world's great sects it is still a sect. There is no universal religion in the world or in America, and the religion that is not universal is sectarian. Under the Constitution and laws and in equity you have no more authority, no more right, to tax one citizen to propagate the religion of all the other citizens than you have to tax all the other citizens to propagate the religion of one citizen. To levy either of these taxes is to unite church and state, something that the Times is as opposed to theoretically as we are in fact.

"The New Brotherhood neither pretends on the behalf of its own members nor of any other persons that the sight of a Bible, a cross, an anchor, a sword, or a crown excites the basest passions of their natures and provokes them to breaches of the peace, even with the addition of the aggravating inscriptions. It does not venture to conjure up the spectacle of an Agnostic mob assembled to eradicate the hateful symbols of priestcraft. Whether the New Brotherhood be an association of secularists or a band of propagandists of the doctrines of Paine and Ingersoll, in either case it does not seem to possess judgment enough to make it important, and the mayor and aldermen of Boston are justified in doing nothing with its 'memorial.'"

According to this precious deliverance, no one has a right to protest against a violation of the fundamental law and an injustice done to himself and others of like views unless he is prepared to confess that the sight or knowledge of the injustice "excites the basest passions" of his nature and provokes him to "breaches of the peace." Of all the inanity that we have to wade through each day in the newspapers and other popular publications this is about the silliest of anything we have read in a twelvemonth. Presumably if the sight of a man torturing a helpless child did not excite the "basest passions" of the spectator's nature the Times would sneer at and denounce him if he should have the temerity to protest against the cruelty. If the "logic" of the Times is sound, only howling mobs of rowdies whose "basest passions" are in the ascendant have any rights in the United States. We must be careful not to offend such, for they are dangerous, but for the man of sane mind and controlled passions, who does not like to see injustice perpetrated, and the guarantees of civil and religious liberty trampled under foot, there is no right of vigorous and dignified protest. Had this theological student editor been a little less stupid it might have occurred to him that such talk as his is the very wind to fan into a flame of righteous wrath the noblest passions of men and women who love liberty and justice and hate canting hypocrisy and sanctimonious villainy.

One thing is gratifying, and that is that in spite of his obtuseness in other directions, the Times writer does not fail to perceive that the protest he ridicules could have been written only by Infidels or other secularists. It shows that we have a good reputation when an apologist for church aggressions, who does not appear to know much else, does know that a memorial asking for equal justice for all citizens was prepared by men who reject the orthodox creeds and politics.

Rev. Thomas Dixon is against the infliction of the death penalty for murder. He says that it is not "humane," to which we agree. But the priestly mind is a queer agglomeration. It must be all mixed up, when it can find it inhumane to execute the cruel murderer of his fellow and yet defend the slaughter of inoffensive birds for "sport." This is worse than straining out a gnat and swallowing a camel.

Rev. Father Ducey says that "the hearts of God's ministers must be kept attuned to the heart of the harmony and sympathy of heaven by the study and sight of deep suffering." The sight and study of deep suffering may awaken sympathy in man, but if there were no suffering there would be no need of awakening sympathy, and for the suffering that does and the suffering that does not arouse sympathy "heaven" is responsible, if Theism is true. "The harmony and sympathy of heaven" are dreams which won't bind up a wound or feed a starving babe, let alone preventing the mangling or the famine.

The Nashville Christian Advocate does not like to hear speakers applauded at Sunday evening religious meetings. It says that hand-clapping and similar forms of applause are "not seemly in a worshiping assembly. Whatever the immediate gain may be, the remote consequences cannot fail to be damaging and injurious." Noise plays a very important part in the religious exercises of many peoples, and we notice that the Salvation Army thinks it helpful in the redemption of souls. Generally at revival meetings there is a chorus of "amens," "praise gods," "hallelujahs," "come right down, lords," and the like, and we do not know that these are any less indecorous than hand-clappings and an occasional "hear, hear," or "that's so." The church is bound to be secularized anyway; she cannot keep up an interest otherwise. While some of the Scotch Presbyterians still think that the devil comes into the church in the organ, other Christians have found it expedient to take in the violin, cornet, and nearly all the rest of the musical outfit.

Oh, the hypocrisy of this Sunday business! On July 14th the old cup-defender, the Vigilant, and the new one, the Defender, tested their relative merits over the course at Newport. Says the report of the New York Press:

"As it was Sunday, the race was not called a race, but merely a friendly sail. It was a race, nevertheless, and decided just what everybody wanted to know—if the Defender was a faster boat than the improved Vigilant."

Could anything imaginable be more childish and pueril? This pretense is akin to that which disgraces Congress—if it does—when the hands of the clock are turned back if a session holds over into Sunday, and the journal is made to read as the record of the proceedings of Saturday. Will we ever, here in the United States, get out of our swaddling-clothes?

The great Christian Endeavor convention recently in session in Boston resolved in favor of Christian citizenship and for Sabbath keeping. The members refused to patronize the street cars on Sunday, so arranging their meetings in different parts of the city that all could walk to the services. If these zealous but foolish young people would only confine themselves to this kind of a boycott they would be within their rights, but they do not, for they are stanch Sabbath law advocates. But are they sure that they are preventing Sunday work by refusing to ride on the cars? Measured by foot-tons, was there not more labor done by them in walking to church than would have been done by the employees of the West End Car Company had the Endeavorers patronized the cars? The exercise was good for them, but the intention was the perpetuation of superstition and the result sought—the reduction of the total of Sunday labor—was not attained.

"Christ's 'Peace be unto you' has never lost its meaning or its power."—Nashville Christian Advocate.

"Those mine enemies that would not that I should reign over them bring hither and slay them before me," says Jesus. "As we said before, so say I now again, If any man preach any other gospel unto you than that ye have received, let him be accursed," thunders Paul. "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned," affirms Jesus, according to a text only recently discredited within the church. "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to live," says the Old Testament, and Jesus did not repudiate the atrocious order to murder, but, on the contrary, recognized the existence of witches and demons and cast them out of multitudes—or the record is false. The old Testament also explicitly commands that the worshipers of "false gods" be put to death, and that their nearest relatives shall be the first to strike them down, and Jesus did not repudiate the command. The history of the Christian church is the official interpretation of these texts. "Christ's peace" has indeed lost none of its meaning, but increasing civilization has deprived it of some of its power.

Almost anything is a crime in this city now except going to church, and we are not so very sure that that will not also be such before long, for three flower-sellers in a cemetery were arrested for supplying mourners with decorations for graves, and of course everyone knows that the churches have charge of most of the funerals. In the trans-Harlem district Mr. Julius Leibertz was arrested for working in his garden, but the magistrate before whom he was brought released him, with a rebuke to the arresting policeman. We hardly see the justice of the rebuke, for gardening on Sunday is no more a necessity than shaving, and the policeman was simply enforcing the law "because it is law." Neither is selling food on Sunday a necessity, as our masters interpret necessity, and so David Mostovitzsky of the East Side was arrested for selling a sausage on "the Lord's day." His lawyer says that he is going to try to prove that such sale was a necessity. He will fail; nothing is a necessity on Sunday that the priests do not like. The delicatessen men have organized to secure the opportunity to open their places after 10 A.M., when they must close, as the law is now enforced—for the disciplining of the police! But what does this mean? We have been hearing all along that the delicatessen men themselves wished to close on Sunday. Is it possible that they have been misrepresented by the preachers and their tools?

Rev. Martin D. Kneeland, secretary of the "New England Sabbath Protectiv League," says that they are greatly encouraged in Massachusetts by the success they had in their fight for an anti-Sunday-theater law. They have good cause to be. Poor old Massachusetts is still under the heel of the Puritan, and he purposes to grind her still deeper into the mire of her own degradation, as this bears witness:

"Our League hopes to unite all forces and [our] declaration meets with general acceptance on the part of the denominations and good citizens. [We are pleased to see that Mr. Kneeland understands the necessity of differentiating good citizens from the denominations.] The Roman Catholics are represented on the executive committee along with all [other] leading denominations. Educational and legislative methods will be employed and the work pushed forward on all sides."

Catholics and Protestants may fight each other savagely over the question of education, because both want to control it, but they work together like brothers for the perpetuation of Sunday superstition and tyranny, because it is to their mutual interest to have a monopoly of the day. We have not yet seen any protests from the state organizations of the Loyal Orange League, the Junion Order of United American Mechanics, the Patriotic Order of the Sons of America, or the American Protectiv Association against the Massachusetts anti-Sunday theater law, nor against the purposed further aggressions of the New England Sabbath Protectiv League.

In Richmond, Va., they are enforcing the law "because it is law" with a thoroughness that should turn New York's officials green with envy. From the account of the crusade on July 28th, which we find in the State, we gather that the police there cannot arrest the violators of the Sunday law on the spot, but must, after witnessing the offense, turn in a complaint at the station house, when a summons is issued ordering the offender to appear before the police court and show cause why he has attended to his own affairs on the first day of the week, which is the personal property of the priests. Shortly after midnight Saturday policemen visited the composing rooms of the Times and the Dispatch, saw that the wicked type-stickers were at work, went back to the station house and made their complaints, and then went out into the morning to hunt for other conspicuous law-breakers. Meanwhile summonses were issued for the proprietors of the two papers. During the day the proprietor of a hotel was reported for running his omnibus and carrying his guests from the hotel to the depots; the Chesapeake and Ohio Railroad company was complained of because the flagman at a crossing flagged a train; the manager of the Adams Express Company, the owner of a parcel delivery wagon, a livery stableman, dealers in ice-cream who were delivering goods to their customers, a transfer company handling the trunks of travelers, newsboys, bootblacks, saloon keepers, the superintendent of a street railway, fruit dealers, cigar sellers, a man who delivered fish ordered by a customer, ice-cream saloon proprietors, an ice manufacturing company, the superintendent of the Richmond Railway and Electric Company, merchants, grocers and other disrupters of society had formal complaints entered against them. We suppose that all this was for the purpose of "disciplining" the Richmond police, although our pious neighbor of the Independent may try to show that it was done solely to kill the saloon traffic. At all events, they are going at the suppression business in a way that must delight the hearts of the Sabbath Union people. There is a vague tradition in this country that the ancestors of some of us threw a quantity of tea into Boston harbor because of objection to tyranny. We do not appear to have spirit enough to throw rotten statutes into the limbo of dead creeds and broken chains. We laugh at the ignorant Catholic for making an obeisance before the toe of the Pope, but we eagerly kiss the very ground trodden by our rural and venal legislators, who are in turn the cringing serfs or the interested allies of the clergy.

The Epworth League—the young people's society of the Methodist church—was recently in national convention at Chattanooga. In an editorial review of the proceedings, the Christian Advocate (South), of Nashville, deprecates the strong tendency which it observed to "applaud the speakers who made the most frequent use of certain catchwords and phrases." "Nothing is cheaper," says the editor, "than to humor the discovered whims of an immense audience." This is very true, and it is one of the explanations why there is so little truth-telling in the pulpit and press and on the rostrum. We fancy that if it were not for the ease with which "the discovered whims" of their congregations and subscribers can be humored, there are a great number of preachers and editors of religious papers who would give expression to some very unorthodox sentiments. It is this desire to humor "discovered whims," to cater to popular delusions and prejudices, that renders so much of the platform eloquence of the day mere "sounding brass and tinkling cymbal," utterly nauseating to persons of sense and convictions. So of most that passes for editorial opinion, and literature. It is echo, not honest thought. A man gets a reputation for eloquence because he can pump out by the hour words, words, words that tickle the ears of the uncritical masses and give countenance to their favorite superstitions. That's why he talks that way—he has "discovered" their "whims."

The Tokyo correspondent of a syndicate of American papers tells a story of one of our missionaries to Japan which finely illustrates the tolerant spirit of Christianity, and shows us what would happen to us if the Sabbatarians could get all the power they are after:

"Jonathan Gobel was a muscular Christian. He feared God and lived a righteous life. He desired every one else to do so, and when moral suasion failed, he often tried force. When he arrived in Japan he was a stalwart, powerful fellow, and usually came out uppermost when he wrestled with sin. He was living in Kanagawa when he endeavored to impress upon the people of that place the propriety of Sabbath observance. The Japanese have no Sunday. They have no fixed day of rest. Their holidays are numerous, and worship continues without interruption in the temples. There is no particular time for preaching, and it is always proper to pray."

But this worship was not of the kind acceptable to Missionary Gobel, and so he told the people that they were terribly wicked to break his Sabbath. But they were very sinful, and would persist in doing as the missionary did, that is, follow the customs of their ancestors. This was more than the righteous missionary could endure. He let his angry passions rise. Difference of opinion generally has that effect on Christians of the zealous sort. One Sunday Mr. Gobel was on his way to his appointed place to preach. He came upon a dozen or more men engaged in building a house. Mr. Gobel was shocked. Mr. Gobel stopped and entreated them to cease from doing wickedness. They refused. He ordered them to stop work. Again they refused. Then Mr. Gobel, missionary, girded up his loins, and sailed in with a heavy bamboo pole. He smote the heathen mightily. Great was the devastation wrought by this "sword of the Lord and of Gideon." Several idolatrous carpenters were laid out senseless. The next day the good Mr. Gobel found himself a prisoner in the office of the United States consul-general, where he pleaded "guilty, with strong provocation." He was put under bonds to keep the peace. If you differ from the Sabbatarian, he will be sure to feel under "strong provocation" to knock you down, or have the policeman do the job for him. Christianity must be put under bonds to keep the peace. This can be done only by the enlightenment of the people and the absolute secularization of all government, municipal, state, and national.

More Books by Colonel Ingersoll.

The Field-Ingersoll Discussion.—In 1888 the Rev. Dr. Henry M. Field—as genial a minister, perhaps, as the Presbyterian creed permits—wrote an open letter to Colonel Ingersoll, with the intent to convert him. The letter was published in the North American Review, and was replied to by the person addressed, which reply was also printed in that magazine. Dr. Field rejoined, and the Colonel answered that. The Discussion, which was entitled "Faith or Agnosticism," was subsequently printed in pamphlet form, and owing to the great interest taken in it, the edition was quickly exhausted, but not reprinted. And until now the holders of the copyright have declined to permit it to be reprinted. However, permission has been obtained, and we have received from Mr. Farrell a supply of the pamphlet. It contains over a hundred large pages, and is very neatly printed, bound in paper, and sells for 25 cents, which is low. Every one of our older readers will know its value at once. To those who do not remember the discussion we can only say that they should lose no time in getting a copy if they want a controversial treat. Dr. Field does not rant and call names in his letters, but writes as a gentleman should, thereby distinguishing himself above most other followers of the meek and lowly one. This attitude gave the Colonel a chance to write so as to reach the tender-hearted among the Christians, as well as those who can reason, and his letters are different from those with which he met the arrogant Lawyer Black's epistles, while equally convincing. The low price at which this pamphlet has been placed should lead to its wide distribution.

The Ingersoll-Gladstone Controversy on Christianity.—When the Field-Ingersoll Controversy closed in the North American Review the Christians felt that their champion had been very badly worsted in argument, and the publishers of the Review engaged the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone to attempt to rehabilitate the Presbyterian creed. England's most noted man is a Christian in general and particular, and is famous as a controversialist. It was thought by the Christian world that, with his training, he might make some headway with the Infidel. He wrote a long letter to Colonel Ingersoll, which was published in the Review, and to which Mr. Ingersoll replied at length, and, it is generally agreed, completely demolished the greatest controversialist Christianity can produce. Unlike the discussion which led to it, this controversy was not reproduced in separate form by the magazine editors, but Mr. Farrell has at last succeeded in obtaining all parties' consent to its publication, and has now printed it uniform with the other. The price is also the same, 25 cents. Send here for it.

Myth and Miracle.—This is one of Colonel Ingersoll's best lectures, but never before put into print. Every one who has heard it will most certainly want it, and those who have not heard it will have a rare treat in its perusal, as something new from the Colonel, which also is something everybody is looking for. It is printed uniform with the other pamphlets, and at the same price, 25 cents.

Since the last acknowledgment was made we have received for the Wise Defense Fund these sums: E. D. Nauman, $1; A. Slaman, $1.50; John Kane, $1; "A Friend," $1; San Marcial (N. M.) Free-thinkers, $5. We thank all these contributors in the name of Mr. Wise and the Freethought party, and will express the hope that many others will do as they have done. Much more money is absolutely necessary in order to make an effective fight for Mr. Wise and equal liberty.

News and Notes.

Chester-le-Street is about the oldest town in the North of England. It dates back to the time of the Britons. Its church is over a thousand years old—the oldest but one in the United Kingdom. I visited it immediately on my arrival, Saturday, July 6th, with Mr. Thos. Birtley and other Freethought friends. It is indeed a venerable institution, and the air of the centuries is brooding about it. Here are the graves of mighty warriors. Here are their stone effigies, ranged alongside the walls of the church in everlasting silence. The trump of Gabriel will never arouse them. The ancient records of the church are a somewhat curious sign of the times. One man burned out of house and home received the munificent sum of one shilling and sixpence to help him out of his difficulties. This, however, might count more than at the present day, seeing that the daily wage of a laborer was only one penny. But in the same record it is also stated that the parson received one pound and six shillings for the purchase of a new umbrella. It seems that an umbrella was far more valuable than the whole possessions of the ordinary farmer. Those were queer times indeed, when saints were innumerable, and rags also. Chester-le-Street is the mother both of Durham and Newcastle. It was about 635 that the episcopal see was established which afterwards was transferred to Durham. In 883 the cathedral building was founded at Chester-le-Street, in which were placed the sacred remains of St. Cuthbert. In 995 these remains were miraculously "deposited where the Cathedral of Durham" now stands, and the ecclesiastical glory and wealth of Chester-le-Street forever departed.

Chester-le-Street has a wonderful record of saintly holiness. Godric lived in Finchdale Priory on the river Wear, and practiced unheard of austerities. He wore an iron shirt next to his skin night and day, and is said to have worn out three; he mingled ashes with the flour from which he made his bread, and lest it should be then too good, kept it three or four months before he ventured to eat it. In winter, as well as in summer, he passed whole nights up to his chin in water at his devotions. He was haunted by beautiful damsels, and so visited by evil concupiscence that he cured himself by rolling naked among thorns and briars. His body grew ulcerated, but to increase his pain he poured salt into his wounds. He finally was admitted into the calendar of saints. I should say that these old monks were fools, if it were not that as the result of their renown for holiness the monasteries became enormously rich. I think there was a method in the madness of these ulcerated saints. If they did not get the heavenly crown, they surely received from credulous votaries the gold and silver and precious stones of this earth, and I shouldn't wonder if they repaid themselves amply in secret for their austerities in public.

At any rate they have left behind churches and cathedrals which even to-day reveal the pomp and splendor of ancient worship; that humanity was crushed in order to give God the glory.

After visiting the church, dim and vague with memories of the superstitious past, I direct my footsteps with my comrades across the green fields to old Lumley Castle, towering magnificently among the groves beyond the river Wear. Over this we ferry in old-fashioned style, and, for the time being, with the moldering and majestic building in the distance, the meadows and forests around the quiet, meandering stream, over whose glassy tide we softly sweep, it seemed as if the nineteenth century melted into the lands of dreams, and the reality of the knightly ages was in the very atmosphere we breathed, and the verdant scenes in which the smoke and noise of industry have not yet prevailed. A grand old building is Lumley Castle, partially inhabited at present, but filled with the dust of ages, with wide desolate rooms in which once was heard the tramp of armed soldiery. We stood on the top of the towers from whence the archers hurled their deadly weapons. We peered into the gloom of the prison cell, and the awful dungeon; we saw the great kitchen and the enormous fireplace by which hundreds of troops could be fed; we viewed the remnants of ancient nobility mingled with the elegance of modern art. The Lumleys were a famous fighting race. They were with William the Conqueror, and among his most trusted councilors and defenders. They have left a brilliant record of devotion and daring in the annals of royalty. They belonged entirely to the old regime, and never had an idea of progress. The castle is a memorial of the past, glittering in melancholy grandeur amidst the festivities of to-day; a place where the traveler from the New World will ponder over the beauty and the sadness of the past; its wild strifes and awful crimes; its gloomy faith, mingled with brave and careless song; its reckless ardor that dashed into the lists of death without a thought save of honor and glory. Beautiful fell the sunshine on this old castle—on its mighty walls and towers; beautiful around it spread the vast and undulating country, with dark green forests and radiant fields; the river Wear shining along in wavering expanses; the city, a thousand years old, glimmering on the indistinct horizon, while the church-spire, hoary with time, attracts the dreamy view. It was a picture where past and present might mingle in poetic charm, and from the darkness and struggle of the one be seen emerging the bloom and brilliancy of the other.

I find a stalwart Freethought company at Chester-le-Street. I lecture at Pelton, about three miles away, for the accommodation of friends at other points. On the whole there is a fair attendance, and I am glad to meet so many ardent comrades. I name a little child, Anna Ellen Lowther, and I am sure from the brightness of her eyes, and the cunning beauty of her smile, that she will ever be on the roll of Freethought. On behalf of parents and friends of universal humanity, I welcomed the little one into the glorious comradeship of truth, of liberty, of justice, of human work and progress. I think it well to thus enroll our children's names on the banners of our marching columns.

I enjoyed Chester-le-Street. There was the freshness and the cordiality of the new, with the suggestiv and moving associations of the old. Where kings and priests once ruled, the forces of Freethought now prevail. It was a contrast which, in the thoughtful mind, awakes a train of thrilling emotions.

I thank the Freethinkers of Chester-le-Street and vicinity for their generous support. In every way my visit to this most ancient spot was a delightful one. I could not have been treated better had I been St. Cuthbert himself.

Newcastle-on-the-Tyne is my Sunday's camping-ground. Here is a great center of industry, shipping, coal, factories, etc. In the time of Queen Elizabeth, although a celebrated town, it had only 3,000 inhabitants. Now it has over 200,000. And these figures do not express the real growth of this country, which is the heart of the North of England, for practically there is a great city here of one million of people, with Newcastle, Gateshead, Tyne-mouth, South Shields, etc. This is one of the oldest civilized and inhabited portions of the kingdom. In the year 80 Agricola, the Roman general, built a fort on the present site of Newcastle, and here also passed the stupendous wall built by the Emperor Severus from the Irish sea to the German ocean. About three miles from Newcastle yet remains a curious fragment of Severus's wall. It is about nine feet in breadth. An apple-tree grows out of the middle of it. From Roman times onward, Newcastle has been connected with the battles and struggles of Danes and Saxons, Scots and English, the houses of York and Lancaster, etc. At Jarrow lived and died the venerable Bede, the best historian of his time. The castle was built during the reign of William the Conqueror. It was at times a royal residence. Afterwards, amidst changing fortunes, it was a place of refuge for thieves and vagabonds flying from justice. It is now the rag fair of the town, a more useful institution as such than when the abode of kings.

Newcastle presents many objects of interest, both in what it has been on the roll of history, and what it is to-day in the world of industry. It has a large radical and Freethought element. John Morley is the representative of this place, and he is well known for his non-Christian opinions, and they do not seem to trouble him politically. The Liberal churchman will give him his vote. I find an excellent organization of Secularists at Newcastle. They are active and hard-working, and cultivate the spirit of comradeship. On Friday evening before the lecture we had a social gathering for the purpose of getting acquainted. Mr. Bartram, secretary, Mr. W. Gilhespy, Mr. Carl Aarshad, Mr. Thomas Foreman, Mr. Peacock, and others, were gathered together. There was a speech of welcome by Mr. Peacock, a response by the American visitor—songs and recitations, and the cheerful circle of an English high tea. It was a very pleasant introduction to the campaign labors. I give three lectures on Sunday, July 7th, to good audiences. The weather was so fine that people would rather walk in the park, or wander by the sea-shore, than attend church, chapel, or lecture. They are beginning to enjoy the Sunday here in a somewhat continental way, and the ancient gloom is disappearing. I was satisfied with the result. Those who do identify themselves with the movement in Newcastle are sturdy in their support. They are jovial companions. On Monday I went over to South Shields, where I met some of the Secularists of this flourishing point. Mr. Peacock, the president of the society, Mr. George White, Mr. Sanderson, of Jarrow, and Mr. Wm. Gilhespy, etc., are gathered around the festive table. Afterwards we walked to the pier, from which, in the illuminated evening, is presented one of the most beautiful sights on the coast of England. The pier runs out one mile into the sea, and over it at times the waves break in giant fury. Here are the life-boat stations. Thousands have been saved from the stormy ocean. The two piers at South Shields and Tynemouth form an immense breakwater, and where once there was only danger to the tossing ship, is now a secure harbor. One would hardly think as he walked along the placid shore where multitudes of people are flocking, where boats are plying, and waves roll softly over the wide beach on which hundreds of children romp, while the sea spreads afar like a mirror, and the banks of the Tyne glow resplendent like fairy halls—one would hardly think that the tempestuous ocean might rush in with ten thousand battalions and shake these colossal piers to their foundation, and thunder to the very streets of the city. But such is sometimes the vast velocity and terror of this now smiling expanse. Man, however, does not lose his courage or his skill, and battles victoriously with the elements. I understand that the modern life-boat, which plunges defiantly into the very jaws of death, and cannot be engulfed, but always comes right-side up amidst the most whirling billows, was first invented at Newcastle. The impetuous bravery of the old Norse kings abides on the river Tyne, and the hero goes forth to combat the storm-god with joyous enthusiasm, not to destroy now but to save.

The North of England makes a noble record for the Freethought campaign; and the time was all too short that I could spend in this varied metropolis, with its progressive spirit, its vast industries, its beautiful surroundings, its thrilling and splendid historic associations. In no part of England can one better observe the evolutions of the human race, its struggle for existence, and the survival of the fittest.

On Tuesday, July 9th, I am again in London, after an absence of about five weeks. I spend Wednesday evening with Mr. and Mrs. Foote, Mr. and Mrs. Gilmour, of Glasgow, and J. M. Wheeler, at the home of Charles Watts, where, among congenial spirits, the life of London flows with the progress of the world. Watts is pre-eminently sociable. He does not reserve all his vivacity for the platform. He believes in good comradeship. And, indeed, we could not stand the tug of war, endure the battle with injustice and wrong, unless at times we did gather about the camp-fire, throw our weapons off, enjoy the pleasures of the hour with mental stimulation and happy impulse. Mr. and Mrs. Watts have the kindly art of making the fire-side light genial to both friend and stranger. Old-time experiences in America come flashing along, while new fields open before. I was pleased to meet our brilliant representative in the North, Mr. Gilmour, who is one of our best-equipped men, a thorough student, and a facile and suggestive lecturer. He keeps things on the move, and Freethought in his hands will never lack a successful defender.

On Thursday, with Mrs. Watts and Mrs. Foote, and Mr. and Mrs. Gilmour, I visit for the first time the wonderful gloom of Westminster Abbey. Here is the buried majesty of the ages. Here are the tombs of kings and queens, of the "illustrious obscure," and of poets and philosophers who have given glory to the universal world. Here for hours one can wander among beautiful and solemn chapels, the sunbeams falling from windows of marvelous hues upon the white faces of the dead shining in statuesque glory; the gorgeous tombs, clothed with imperial regalia; the marble slab, silent over the ashes of immortal genius; along the old parliament house, small and barren, within whose walls once rolled and surged an imperious host, and the green sward contrasting with the desolation of decay. To the eye of imagination, the portals of the centuries seem to open; the dust awakes, and a multitudinous procession appears. The old minster seems to melt, and its "frozen music" becomes an abounding melody of life. The poetry, the art, the romance, the gallantry and splendor of a thousand years fill the venerable aisles, and the great city is forgotten in the thronging shadows of this over-arching sepulcher, enriched with the pathos and sublimity of the dead generations.

Friday I had the pleasure of dining again at Simpson's, with Watts, Foote, Forder, and Mr. George Anderson. This time he gives the Pilgrim a beautiful golden compass, so that wheresoever he may travel—on top of the Andes, or on Greenland's icy shores, or India's coral strand, or, it may be, Siberia's darksome plains—he will have, not the word of God, but the beautiful finger of nature, the unerring needle, that is ever constant to the glorious shining star, to guide him to liberty and truth. I thank my friend for this magnet of nature—more faithful than any saint, more accurate than any Bible, more subtle than any god, more enduring than any church—that, ever pointing to the sparkling reality, is a thousand times greater blessing to humanity than a million golden crosses.

One would scarcely think that among the crowding masses of London one would ever meet by chance a friend from America. One might roam for a hundred years in these streets and never come across another's track. But it happened that almost the first thing that Dr. Darrow, of Fargo, and Mr. Morton, of Minneapolis, did was to meet the Pilgrim on the Strand, one of the great thoroughfares of London. I couldn't recognize my transatlantic friends at first, it seemed so wildly improbable that anybody from Dakota or Minnesota would be in London. But so it was. I rallied to the occasion, and America for the moment was in the ascendant and we hardly realized that we were on the oriental side of the "great herring-pond." We joined forces for the time being, and beheld the wonders of the Palace, and the delightfully horrible wax-works of Madam Tussaud. It being a supreme necessity for all foreigners, especially Americans, to see these wax-works, we proceeded to do the business at the earliest moment. The exhibition is really no better than a ten-cent show in Chicago, except in the extent and the awful realism of its exhibits. There is quite a gorgeous display of the kings and queens of history, the great warriors, the successful statesmen, but to my mind the most interesting wax statue in the whole collection was that of Madam Tussaud herself—a little bit of a woman, but apparently full of grit and extraordinary energy; and it certainly must have taken an immense amount of enthusiasm and persistency to have gotten together a collection like this—the most varied and grotesque collection to be seen on the planet, especially the "Chamber of Horrors"—what a lurid fascination in these uncouth displays! Here is the identical trunk that held the murdered body, the identical knife that did the bloody deed, the identical dress worn by the victim, and so on to the end of the thrilling chapter. It was a relief to finish the round of this infernal curiosity shop.

Saturday I journey to Bristol. I am welcomed to the hospitable home of Dr. and Mrs. Stevens, and the days of work and entertainment pass delightfully along. The doctor is an earnest Free-thinker, and it would be a great help to our cause if a few more like him would stand in the ranks. He questioned the parliamentary candidates of his district as to their position in regard to the "Blasphemy laws," by which the Secularists of England are at present outlawed. The Liberal candidate expressed himself as distinctly in favor of their repeal, but Michael Hicks Beach, the Conservative candidate, said that while the law in its present form was a little old-fashioned, yet he was in favor of a blasphemy law of some kind. He was also opposed to the opening of museums, etc., on the "Sabbath," and expressed a great horror of the "continental Sunday." I think this is about the general position of the Tory party, and if that party wins, there is but little hope of the repeal of the "Blasphemy laws," although it must be admitted, even by the Conservativ, that these laws are an outrage on human rights. The parliamentary election is at present occupying the attention of the community to the exclusion of almost everything else; and so for the time being the Free-thought audiences are not so large as they might otherwise be.

I must thank Mr. and Mrs. Stevens for their kind attention to the American visitor. I must record the smiles and beauty of the little baby—five months old—Dorothy Winifred, who contributed much to the enjoyment of the occasion, and who will, no doubt, ever illuminate the path of Free-thought, if the laws of heredity prevail and the promise of a happy birth. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Hints for Mr. Roosevelt.

Anybody who plays a game of any kind within two miles of any religious meeting is guilty of a misdemeanor under Section 275 of our extraordinary penal code. Why do not the police shut up all the billiard rooms, chess clubs, and the like during the Friday evening prayer meeting time?

Under section 277 of the Penal Code everybody connected with music halls, roof gardens and the like is a law breaker if acrobatic performances, rope-walking, exhibitions of strength, juggling or anything of the kind is permitted there. Why do not the police enforce this law?

If Mr. Roosevelt will read page 2,223 of the Revised Statutes he will learn that every time he or any other citizen uses a "big, big D" he incurs a penalty of $1, which he must pay or go to jail. If Mr. Roosevelt's police rigidly enforce this law the revenues of New York will overflow.

These are examples merely. They show that our statute books are full of dead-letter laws which the police do not enforce or attempt to enforce.—New York World.

Huxley's Funeral.

From the Agnostic Journal.

On the afternoon of July 4th the beautiful cemetery at East Finchley was invaded by pilgrim mourners assembled to honor themselves by reverent farewell to the dead leader, Thomas Henry Huxley. The crowd was numerically insignificant, but intellectually unique. Its annihilation would have been numerically imperceptible among England's teeming millions, but profoundly perceptible as a deduction from the sum total of England's intellectual life. In the hush of the surrounding hills and woods, heads were bared in homage to what in life was illustrious, in death a mighty influence. The centuries are as sorcerers—in another age Huxley would have passed in the flame of the martyrs instead of by natural doom. There was, in truth, a suggestion of tragedy. In sad, stern silence Leslie Stephen, Lecky, and many another brilliant rebel listened to the rites of the Church of England recited over the grave of the foremost and most uncompromising heretic of this generation.

There was no pageantry, as the Times observed. None was needed. There were no idle sight-seers, save perhaps a few villagers. These, by the way, were the only respondents to the "Amen" of the burial service. The Rev. J. L. Davies, old friend and neighbor of Huxley, liberal priest and evolutionist that he is, faltered in tremulous utterance. It may be that personal grief sensibly gave him pause. It may have been—and I think it was—that a sense of incongruity, of desecration—nay, even of shame—moved him as he was compelled to connect the official "sure and certain hope of resurrection" with the memory of the iconoclast of theology and the constructor of science. The force of superstition, allied to social convention, and probably (it is for one of the Huxley family who may read these lines to correct if the guess is wrong) some instinct of sentiment in one or other that loved him, made it possible and inevitable that a priest of the church of England (however unorthodox) should be obliged to say:

Lord, have mercy upon us.
Christ, have mercy upon us.
Lord, have mercy upon us.

Respectfully and in profoundest sympathy with survivors it may be submitted that the very eminence of Huxley, so stalwartly sincere, demands that the world of science and enlightened culture should be advised whether this gnostic service was consistent with any wish or concession before the death that is lamented. If the responsibility rests with any who shared his life and love, criticism is disarmed while regret is active. We may especially appeal to Mr. Leonard or Mr. Henry Huxley to enlighten the public in historic justice to posterity.

Regret, however, is vain. Pride endures. Like the symbolic oak that restfully shadows the grave where the investigator now lies incurious, the lost leader could break but never bend. The willow that neighbors the oak sways to passing winds even as his affection was emotional. The ironclad smiter of Wace and Gladstone and the Gadarean swine was human, loving, and lovable. The quaint, tiny tombstone next his grave is eloquent witness—his first-born rests there: "Son, thy father brings thee sorrowing." Two of the Pollocks read that passionate sentence; the brave wife of William Kingdon Clifford paused over it, thinking then, maybe, of one of whom it was written, "Even as no man loved life more, so no man feared death less."

The sons of Darwin were there, Herbert Spencer was represented, Mrs. Humphry Ward—all of interest to readers of this journal. The authoress of "Robert Elsmere"—the famous heretical novel—was subject to the "heckling" of a stray and belated priest as the writer passed her. "Now, what would you prefer to think—immortality or annihilation?" the priest was uttering with unction. Perhaps I heard, perhaps thought I heard, the answer: "What we prefer to think is not always true!"

"What we prefer to think is not always true!" That was the sonorous message of the lost leader. He is dead, but not recreant. We shall remember him differently from the "lost leader" of Browning: We that had loved him so, followed him, honored him, Lived in his . . . magnificent eye,

Learned his great language, caught his clear accents,
Made him our pattern to live and to die.

But we shall not think of one who left us for a "handful of silver," for a "riband to stick in his hat;" we shall think of our rags that were purple to his heart—he who declined no task, left no foot-path untrod. The "devil's triumph," the "wrong to man and insult to God," was pronounced by the priest who journeyed from Westmoreland to oblige whoever was responsible for the blasphemous—there is no other word—rites of the church that Huxley combated with a combativeness inspired by the love of science and the care for mankind. And the priest said "Amen," and only the villagers responded. There were those by that grave who loved Huxley and who understood his life's work. How apposite it would have been had only two or three individuals, selected almost at random from that distinguished group, delivered each his brief dirge and eulogy by the side of that as yet unclosed grave! But it was not to be.

Saladin, Frederick Millar, and the present writer walked sadly away, thinking one thought—Superstition is endowed and fortified. It curses the cradle and the grave. Who shall end the last hypocrisy? John Morley was not there, but one, at least, thought of his words on his "dead master," John Stuart Mill:

"We have lost a great teacher and example of knowledge and virtue; but men will long feel the presence of his character about them, making them ashamed of what is indolent or selfish, and encouraging them to all disinterested labor both in trying to do good and in trying to find out what the good is—which is harder." AMOS WATERS.

"Desiccated Saints."

We are glad to note, by reverential articles in the New York World and the San Francisco Examiner, that St. Peregrinus has passed the United States Custom House, and is now installed in St. Anselm's Church, at One Hundred and Fifty-third street, New York City. When the saint was hoisted ashore in his sealed and padlocked box, a United States custom inspector was about to open him up, so as to see whether he was dutiable or not. But Father Gerard Spielman explained to the inspector of customs that "the canon rule of the Roman Catholic church required that the seals of a sacred relic should be broken only in the presence of the highest ecclesiastical authority, whose duty it is to pronounce upon their genuineness." The inspector thereupon let St. Peregrinus pass. We do not quite see why. The customs inspectors on the New York docks are not governed by the "canon rules of the Roman Catholic church," but by the regulations of the United States Treasury Department. These are so strict that the ordinary man cannot get even a hat-box through without opening it. Why, therefore, was St. Peregrinus permitted to pass? Evidently the Roman church has a pull with the custom house.

It is not so much permitting St. Peregrinus to pass free that we object to as it is permitting him to pass unopened. It is not probable that St. Peregrinus could be considered dutiable. Neither in the McKinley nor in the Wilson tariff is there any mention made of desiccated saints. But in the name of those American citizens and citizenesses who are forced, when landing from European steamers, to open trunks and boxes, to delve into their deepest recesses, and to drag out into the garish light all sorts of wearing apparel, we protest against such discrimination. Let all dried foreign saints, parts of dried foreign saints, and all parcels, portions, or integuments of dried foreign saints, be subject to as severe examination as are the impediments of living American sinners.

We are told that St. Peregrinus is the first of his brand to enter the United States whole. Most desiccated saints are shipped here in sections, the other portions being used to work miracles in other cities and in other lands. As the respectful Examiner says: "This is the first genuine entire body of a saint ever brought to this country, although, of course, there are plenty of relics here in the shape of fragments of saints and certain of their belongings." The wrist-bone of St. Anne, "the grandmother of God," will most readily recur to the minds of our readers in this connection. There is a thumb-bone of St. Anne's, if we are not mistaken, at the church of the Redemptorists in New York, where it is engaged in curing people of all sorts of minor maladies, but the larger and more effective fragment of St. Anne is the wrist-bone, which is now working in a Quebec church, where it cures even fatal disorders, with the utmost certainty and dispatch.

What possibilities in Peregrinus! It is true that his healing qualities have not been passed upon. Archbishop Corrigan, however, "has examined all the documents, authenticated the relic, and approved of its being exposed to public veneration in the church itself." St. Peregrinus is to be placed in a shrine in the church of St. Anselm. When there, it remains to be seen what he can do. We have already given the fairy-like history of St. Peregrinus up to his final enshrining in Bavaria, where he slowly desiccated and grew in the odor of sanctity. If he is any kind of a saint at all he ought to be able to do more than the fragmentary saints already shipped to these shores. We shall look with much interest for accounts of the miracles to be performed by Peregrinus when he gets to work.—San Francisco Argonaut.

Cyclones and Superstition.

Readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER know that about the middle of last month a cyclone descended from the clouds upon a hamlet called Cherry Hill, in Bergen county, New Jersey, and wiped the ground with the inhabitants and their houses. Five persons are reported to have lost their lives, while the destruction of property probably amounts to twenty-five per cent of the assessed valuation of the buildings in the borough. The Rev. Mr. Duryee, pastor of the single church in Cherry Hill, stood upon the rickety steps of the half-demolished home of the slain Conrad Friedman, across the street from his own wrecked tabernacle, and told the assembled mourners and villagers that the cyclone had its origin with God, and was one of the deity's ingenious methods of chastening his beloved. The deceased Mr. Friedman was a hotel keeper. When the storm of July 13th came up he went to an upper part of the house to close a window, but while there the cyclone lifted the roof, the chimney fell upon him, and he was dashed to pieces. Among the Rev. Mr. Duryee's hearers was Mr. August Mund, a German Socialist and Freethinker, doing business as a mason and a grocer. Mr. Mund's barn had been swept away, and his hired man, a Hungarian, known to him only as Antone, carried across the road into the middle of a cornfield, where he was picked up dead. When Mr. Mund heard the Rev. Mr. Duryee say that the cyclone had been sent to Cherry Hill by providence, and when he further heard the clergyman pray for a continuation of the divine blessing, he is said to have ejaculated, "Pfui!" "Humbug!" and to otherwise have expressed his dissent from the theological view. Later on, as he related the foundations of his barn and of one of his houses that had been twisted off its base, he argued with the spectators that if the cyclone had any theological significance whatever, it proved that there was no overruling providence. In a week he had the frame of a new barn reared, when another storm came up and the southeast post of the structure was demolished by lightning. Then his religious neighbors were sure that Mr. Mund must admit that the Almighty was participating in the proceedings, but he didn't. On the contrary, he pointed out that the cyclone had damaged the church more than his property, and that the lightning that hit his new barn had struck two churches in Hackensack only a mile or two away. The reasonable explanation, he said, was that Cherry Hill lay in the path of storms or in a center of electrical disturbance. As they were unable to answer his arguments the neighbors concluded to boycott him, and in the local papers a statement was published that he would receive no further patronage as a grocer or as a mason.

The state of affairs above described came to the knowledge of Mr. Henry Bird, president of the Newark, N. J., Liberal League, and, as he stated in a letter to THE TRUTH SEEKER office, his indignation burned within him. He at once dispatched a note to Mr. Mund soliciting the use of his barn, and printed circulars announcing a meeting there on Sunday, August 4th, to discuss the subject of "Causes of Cyclones." Besides Mr. Bird, the speakers advertised were Henry Rowley, of the Brooklyn Philosophical Association; Prof. Daniel T. Ames, of the New York Liberal Club, and Alderman McGuire, of Paterson.

The occasion promised to be so interesting that instead of writing Observations, I concluded to vary my usual form of Sabbath-breaking by attending. Cherry Hill is about twenty miles from New York, on the New York and New Jersey railroad, a line I had not previously heard of. Before reaching the place the passenger begins to see signs of the cyclone's havoc among the trees lying broken and withered along the track. The first thing noticed by the stranger is that at Cherry Hill there is no station. There was one, but the wind took it across the track into the swamp. Accompanied by my family I wandered about the hamlet. The ground is covered with wreckage—shingles, window-panes, pulverized glass and plastering, and tin roofs either lying on the grass or lodged half-way up a tree. Uprooted trees are everywhere, and the grass in the mowing-lots is as flat as if a river had flowed over it. Some houses are totally demolished, while others, susceptible of repair, have been got into living shape again. The church, a structure about sixty feet square, stands askew on its foundations. Under the impetus of the wind it started off toward the southeast, but caught on a locust stump after going about two feet. Its north side is shattered and pierced by beams that came end-on, like arrows, from the broken-up hotel across the way. The corner-stone bears the inscription, "Re-erected 1892." In that year the building was destroyed by lightning. The congregation now worships God, and licks the hand that smote it, beneath a tarpaulin in the rear of the edifice.

While we were yet viewing the wreck, thunder began to rumble in the sky and we sought shelter at the house of Mr. Mund, the defendant. This gentleman turned out to be a well-informed German-American, with a hearty contempt for politics and politicians and no use whatever for religion and ministers. There is nothing aggressive about him except an inclination to express his thought on such subjects as are up for discussion in his presence. He is primarily a Socialist, and regards churches as an accident of "capitalism." He is a reader of the People, the Socialist paper of this city, and knows of Karl Marx and Lassalle and Shevitch and Sanial and De Leon and Alexander Jonas, but he never heard of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and perhaps never of Ingersoll, except as what the People calls him, "a doctrinaire of the god Capital." The Cherry Hill-dwellers say Mund is an Anarchist, but that only proves, first, that they don't know what he is, and, second, that they don't know what Anarchist means. His little store provides the railroad section hands and the foreign population generally with a place to meet, and smoke, and talk, and also with tobacco, ginger ale, candy, ham, bologna, and blutwurst. He is a man of family, of substance, and of industry, and with a good trade and money ahead doesn't give a damn for the "capitalistic ingredient" of Cherry Hill.

The rain fell vigorously until about three o'clock, the hour of the meeting, and just as it got through Mr. Bird arrived from Newark in a carriage, and Mr. Rowley from Brooklyn by rail. Mr. McGuire, the Socialist alderman of Paterson, did not come at all, neither did Professor Ames. The rain kept away the crowd that was due from Hackensack; the Paterson contingent, presumably Socialistic, failed to assemble, and apart from the dozen Freethinkers who had got wind of the meeting, there was no audience except Mr. Mund's neighbors and a few bicyclers from down the line. But the proceedings, though delayed, were not postponed. Messrs. Bird and Rowley consulted, looked over the field, and reasoned about as follows: "Here are a score of people within the sound of our voices. It cannot be possible that all of them know the cause of cyclones. We have come here to sow seed, and we will sow it, if only to the air." And so, with a heroism which I could never hope to attain, they got a table and a chair, and Mr. Bird, as president, opened the meeting. In due form he announced the subject to be discussed, "Causes of Cyclones," and informed us of the light in which the matter would be discussed. He then introduced Mr. Rowley.

The president of the Brooklyn Philosophical Association took us all into his confidence at once, pointing out that we had been called together by a calamity that had fallen upon the community unprovoked, without warning and without redress. Then he explained the origin of winds—the warming of the earth's surface by the sun, the rising of the heated atmosphere making room for the colder air to rush into the vacuum which nature abhors—all as simple as the draught of a stove with a fire in it. The meeting of diverse currents of air formed the cyclone. The occurrence of this phenomenon in Cherry Hill was not a miracle, but on the contrary it would have been a miracle if the cyclone had not resulted from the atmospheric conditions prevailing there on July 13th. Passing to the theological view that the whirlwind was sent from heaven to discipline the people of the community, and that it had fallen heaviest, as in justice it must, on those most deserving of chastisement, he asked if any person present would dare to maintain that theory in the house of one of the sufferers. Did they think that God, like a cannibal, would devour his own offspring with those of his enemies? In regarding natural phenomena, religious people are as children in the dark. Children are not afraid of the darkness itself, but they are afraid because they cannot see what is around them. So with the religious mind: it is blinded by superstition, or too indolent to investigate, and so stands in terror of the creatures of its own imagination. God never built a house in Cherry Hill, but it would be as reasonable to expect him to do so as hold that he had destroyed one.

In such manner did Mr. Rowley, for a period of forty minutes, agitate the gray matter of the Hill-dwellers; and when he closed there was applause from unexpected sources.

Forty or fifty persons were now present, some sitting in carriages at a safe distance, and more arriving. Mr. Bird made an address. Considering the hypothesis that atmospheric disturbances are a means of punishment, he pointed to the apparent lack of purpose in those phenomena and the waste of energy involved in employing them with such an object in view. But would God be likely to destroy his own property to punish somebody else? If God was powerful enough to create a universe and set it in motion, would he not presumably have sufficient influence over a modest cyclone to steer it clear of buildings dedicated to his worship, where his creatures met habitually to prostrate themselves and invoke his mercy? Let them ask themselves this question standing beside their only church, warped, twisted, and bilged and hung up on a locust stump, like a stranded vessel on a sandbar. Mr. Bird had asked a lady in Cherry Hill if she thought God sent the cyclone, and she replied that she attributed it to the devil. Asked if God did not provide the world with a devil, she said that was a mystery. "Show me a mystery," said Mr. Bird, "and I will show you a humbug." Truth offers no mysteries as explanations of natural events.

Mr. Bird was getting warmer and more interesting every minute, when train time came and I had to leave. At the place where the station used to be we waited, with Mr. and Mrs. Rowley, a quarter of an hour for the cars to come along. From that point we could look back up the road and see that Mr. Bird kept his audience with him. Whether he missed our presence or not, I had no means of determining, but he had a carriage in waiting and was independent of railroads. We could see his vigorous gesticulation and knew that he was giving them the true doctrine. As the train came up we waved an unobserved good-by to the sturdy old warrior doing valiant battle for the truth, and then we were borne homeward. Some minutes later a rift in the trees gave us a last glimpse of the meeting place, and he was there still, smiting away at superstition with undiminished energy. Long life to him!

GEO. E. MACDONALD.

In Eastern Oregon.

Wagner is a paradise in the Blue mountains—Grant county, Or.—and nowhere has Secularism better representatives. I left home June 29, and the following Sunday was met at Hepner by Mr. Ferd Hunt and a fine team, and the forty-mile drive over the mountains was most enjoyable. Mr. Hunt is a magnificent fellow—jolly, generous, and with resources of laughable stories that shorten time and distance.

We arrived at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Warren Carsner in time for supper, and with their bright children, Robert and Maude, and other friends my first evening in Eastern Oregon was pleasantly passed. There never was a happier home than this until the death of their little darling Bertie. How sorry we all are for them, and how gladly would we lessen their grief! Messrs. Z. and O. Martin, loyal friends, are also just now mourning the death of their dear old mother.

The Secularists here had been looking forward to my coming for several months, and had made preparations to celebrate the Fourth in grand style, and you may be sure they did, too. What a host of good friends! Maxwell Ramsby, who might well be called the father of Secularism on the Pacific coast; George and Carl Wagner, on nobler men than whom the sun never shone—whose honesty, sincerity, and all-round goodness have made them honored and loved by Secularists and Christians alike; William Collins, who once escorted the Secular Pilgrim through part of this Haystack country, and who is a reformer politically as well as religiously; Mrs. Collins, the gentle "little mother," and her children; Mr. and Mrs. William Gates; Mr. and Mrs. W. P. Anderson, and many others. I cannot mention them all and still have space to tell about the "Trinity," as Mrs. A. M. Crawford, of Lone Rock, has christened the three preachers who the past two weeks have been making desperate efforts to defend their faith here.

Before I came our friends had sent out a general challenge to the preachers to meet me in debate, and on the Fourth of July the "Trinity" materialized, viz., Rev. Mr. Bramlet the Father, Rev. J. T. Moore the Son, and Rev. Mr. Henton the Ghost. The "Father" is a very poor excuse for a man, with a great deal of Braden pugnacity, and when challenged he replied that he "would debate with her provided she would shingle her hair and put on trousers." So after my morning oration on "Ideal and Actual Liberty" and my afternoon address on "What Secularism Has Done for Woman," I publicly challenged the "Father" to debate with me the "Woman and Church" question, telling him that I had heard what he had said, and if he would not debate with me as I was, I would accept his conditions, for the satisfaction of discovering to his parishioners that they had over them a shepherd unfit to guard their religious fences. But he did not want to debate. He said he had a "representative" who would "give me all the debate I wanted." That representative was the "Son," Rev. F. J. Moore, a Baptist minister from Mitchell, and we agreed to debate the following questions, three days to each question: "Resolved, That the Bible is of Divine Origin," and "Resolved, That Infidelity is Conducive to the Enlightenment, Morality, and Happiness of Mankind."

Christians and Infidels for miles and miles around attended the debates. No such interest in religious questions was ever seen before in that whole region. The "Son," outside of debate, is an affable gentleman, and I enjoyed his acquaintance, but his method of debate is that of all Christian ministers. The overwhelming historical evidence presented by me on the first question he either ignored or referred to as "Catholic and semi-Infidel opinions," and tried to make out that nothing was good authority that did not originate with Baptists. He repudiated every sect but the Baptists, yet in his defense of the second question, he was only too glad to fall back on Clark Braden's pamphlet. He spent the greater part of two days reading from Braden. It was decidedly the weakest defense I ever heard, and in that community added nothing to the glory or credit of Christianity. Our friends here are jubilant over the result, and the applause that greeted my closing speech was something tremendous. Others will probably tell you more about the debates. I have agreed to debate the same questions with the same "Son" at Mitchell.

To day the campaign at Wagner closes with a lecture in the morning, "Freethought the Fundamental Reform," and a session of the Wagner Secular Sunday-school in the afternoon. Though the debates have kept me busy, I have managed to get a good deal of enjoyment out of it all. I do not wonder that Putnam wrote so charmingly of his trip through the Haystack country. I have been treated royally by these earnest friends, and I love them all for their generous hospitality, enthusiastic support, and good wishes.

Silverton, the banner Secular town on the coast, will have to look well to her laurels, for here, nestled among the mountains, is a formidable rival, and, while all of the hundreds of Liberals I have met here are interesting, I must especially mention Mrs. A. M. Crawford, of Lone Rock. She is fifty-five and upwards, hale, hearty, gentle, loving, witty, and aggressive. She is simply a power for our cause. "Heavenly signboards," she calls the preachers, and they are usually the butt of her inexhaustible jokes. A compilation of her laughable sayings would be a splendid antidote for the blues.

I leave these good people with regret, but with the happiest of recollections.

Wagner, Or., July 14. KATIE KEHM SMITH.

Two Days with Mr. Putnam at Birmingham.

Mr. Putnam, I suppose, must think England a land of rapid transit, as I thought America a land of velocity in eating. At the Astor dining-rooms in New York I saw persons enter, speak to the waiter, pay the cashier, and depart. In the interval they had eaten their dinner, but that I did not observe, so quickly was it done. In like manner Mr. Putnam goes to a railway station here, takes his ticket, and before long the guard requires it to be delivered up, and Mr. Putnam finds himself at the end of his journey before he is conscious that he has set out. So short are our long distances compared with those to which he has been accustomed. Twice he arranged to visit me at Brighton, and twice arrangements made for him prevented his coming. So I went up to London and thence to the Midlands, as he was to speak in my native city, Birmingham. I went in order that I might preside at his orations there, and "present" him to the audience, as you say in America. My friend Mr. Daniel Baker, who gave Baskerville Hall to the Secular movement, would have presided had he sufficiently recovered from a recent illness. It was therefore I undertook to welcome Mr. Putnam to Birmingham. I said: "A man who had placed his son under Rowland Hill assured the famous preacher that the youth 'had talent, but he buried it in a napkin.' After a time the father asked what Rowland Hill thought of the student, when Rowland Hill answered, 'he had shaken the napkin at all corners, and there was nothing in it.' When I was a youth,

I was told there was a priceless talent in the napkin of Christianity, and I thought so too. But when I became a man and needed resources, I opened the napkin and found there is in it nothing serviceable—mysteries which no man could understand—stories which gave no direction—assertions which no one could prove—precepts which no one could practice, and statements concerning deity painful to read. I took one corner of the napkin and let them fall to the ground, and I have never picked them up again. Now I am glad to listen to anyone who, like Mr. Putnam, preaches a wiser, a more practical, and a more relevant faith. That is why I have come here this morning."

The Birmingham Freethinkers did their best for their American visitor. The placards were superb and plentiful, but having no hall they had to hire one, to which many who wished to hear Mr. Putnam would not go. The rain, storm, and thunder were against him all day. Still he abated nothing of his energy or fulness of speech. We found him an intrepid speaker with the instinct of the orator in him. There were no "ragged sentences," as rhetoricians call them. Each was self-contained and complete, which only a speaker who is self-possessed and is a master of expression can produce. He has passion as well as articulate velocity which commands attention and retains it. Mr. R. Taylor presided in the afternoon, when, as Quakers say, "the spirit moved" the American orator, as it did also in the evening, when I presided again. Effective sentences were frequent. One was an answer to a Christian objector Mr. Putnam had met, who said "he should commit great crimes but for the fear of hell," to whom Mr. Putnam answered that "in that case he had better stick to hell, and he hoped hell would stick to him;" a reply which effectually disposed of the accusation that Freethinkers would deprive scoundrels of their Christianity. Mr. Putnam went next day to Stratford-on-Avon, the land of Shakspeare. He will return to America with an eye "with fine frenzy," not "rolling," let us hope, but steady and luminous.

Saladin published the generous message Colonel Ingersoll sent by Mr. Putnam in the Agnostic Journal. It has not appeared elsewhere in England. The second day implied in the title of this paper refers to our first meeting at Albany Cottage, Balsall Heath, the residence of Mr. Daniel Baker, the oldest and noblest friend of Freethought in the Midlands, when we all talked of everything. Mr. R. Taylor and Mr. Putnam's host at Shirley were of the party.

GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE.

Eastern Lodge, Brighton.

Mr. Steiner Philosophizes.

A Freethought lecturer has a varied experience. Possibly no other traveler is in a better position than he to study persons and places. He will lecture in a small town, and have every one out to hear him. In a large place, it takes great effort to bring out a fair audience. Sometimes he will talk in a small hall well-filled, and at others in a large one before a small audience. It is interesting to note how the majority of the people are affected by the sentiments of those in the ascendancy. Where the church has all under its thumb, and Christian bigotry, more poisonous than the serpent's fangs, permeates everything, the great masses will unthinkingly succumb to it. Where the men of influence are Liberals, we have the same effect, but from the opposite direction. There you find an intellectual hospitality and freedom, in great contrast with what exists in a church town. Even the churches themselves are affected by the spirit of toleration. Sometimes a lecturer will find outspoken Liberals in abundance. At other times, fear of orthodox boycott and ostracism keeps all but a few under cover. In some places the majority of the people do him honor. In most he is looked upon either as a monstrosity, to be seen once in a lifetime, or as an awful being, cursed of God, and to be shunned.

Accustomed to these changes, when I go to a new field of labor, I am constrained to ask myself, "Well, what next?"

From Park River to Red Jacket, Mich., required a journey of two days and two nights. I go through the timber regions of the North, where for many miles the only signs of human life are the log huts of the men who fell the forests. Red Jacket is in the copper regions, and is built on an island in Lake Superior. The vicinity is rich in copper and iron, and some silver and gold has been found. It is a peculiar place. Twenty-two thousand inhabitants, thirty-three nationalities represented, with each language spoken; twenty-two churches, five of which are Roman Catholic. The latter prevail. Last summer the people paid the priests to pray the grasshoppers away. The insects at once flew on the fence, and did no more damage. Protestant and Catholic bigotry are united. The mayor refused us the city hall, saying that as long as he was chief executive no Infidel lectures could be given in the city building.

The Sunday laws of Michigan are here enforced with great severity on some people, for they are used to gratify malice more than to protect "God's day." Business houses of all kinds were kept open unmolested on Sunday, yet a few persons have been heavily fined of late for the same offense. On every side you find a saloon. The mass of the people care for nothing but drinking, carousing, and brutal sports. Filth and fanaticism are characteristic.

Everything was against us. First, by the stupidity of the pious mayor we were refused the best hall in town, and had to be content with an inferior one. A theatrical troupe for three nights, Memorial Day, and an Italian holiday were our competitors. Five lectures were advertised, but we gave only three. Fair audiences, including two high-school teachers, attended the last two, which were given on Sunday. I found a few splendid Liberals. Mr. C. H. Chase entertained me handsomely. He is thoroughly interested in Freethought, and is not ashamed to say so. Mr. Kenny, though in business, flies his colors to the breeze, as do all his family. Mr. Chase's mother is a Liberal Spiritualist. Captain Paulsen is an intelligent colored gentleman, and, of course, a Liberal. He is a great admirer of "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," and rendered us substantial financial support. Dr. Tape is also a Liberal and a Truth Seeker subscriber. Mr. Little, though a member of the Congregational church agrees with us in many things, and will soon, I think, stand on our platform. Red Jacket Liberals are not discouraged, and, when given a fair chance, are determined to make a course of lectures successful. Mr. Ezra Gladding, of Lake Linden, came over and heard all the lectures.

Freethought meetings should always be held in a good hall. They should not be advertised in a hall over a saloon, or in a dingy, dirty building in an out-of-the-way place. A good hall may cost more than a poor one, but the benefits to the cause will be greater. They must be well advertised, and they cannot be too well. Do not rely on handbills. People give them little attention, and Christians gather them up and destroy them. Posters are to be preferred, but one dollar spent in the newspapers is worth five spent in any other advertising. Written cards should be sent to all the Liberals. Lectures should not only be announced, but they should be kept before the people for at least a week before they begin. When these rules are observed I believe lectures can be made successful in nine places out of ten. FRANKLIN STEINER.

Treachery to the Constitution.

The Christian Statesman, referring to the plan of Mr. Woolley for the "reformation" of all things political and moral, says that the recognition of Christ as King is the "great, fundamental reform that needs, first of all and above all, to be secured." With a majority of the voters in favor of prohibition and willing to follow "Jesus Christ the Conqueror" in their political actions, the end sought can be achieved. But such a majority not ready to follow Jesus Christ will "utterly fail." That is of interest to some people besides Christians and live Freethinkers. This is the way Rev. R. C. Wylie, the writer of the editorial in question, reasons:

"If it is the proper thing for voters to combine under the leadership of Jesus Christ it is proper that the nation should acknowledge him as King. If he is the King of voters [as Mr. Woolley alleged], he is also the King of nations."

Mr. Wylie has no hope of the success of prohibition unless the advocates of the system will "combine under the banner of King Jesus," and he expresses his conviction that in connection with some of the "reforms" whose leaders believe they can win success only by following Jesus Christ "the nation will be led to honor him as Kings of kings." What Mr. Wylie hopes we fear, and it is because of this fear that we continually warn Liberals to beware of the seductions of the moralistic force "reformers" of all schools. If God and Christ and the Bible are smuggled into the citadel of our liberties it will be in the Trojan horse of some so-called moral reform. Only thus can our Constitution be transformed from a charter of religious liberty into a church warrant of persecution and spoliation.

Still Others Want the Book.

FARRINGTON, CAL., July 27, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Please send me the "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book."

SHERMAN L. FALL.

WELDON, IA., July 15, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $3 for THE TRUTH SEEKER and "Pictorial Text-Book." Mr. Cook made me a present of it three months, I believe, and I want it all the time. I send 40c. for cheap tracts.

Yours truly, CHAS. FOSTER.

MILL CREEK, IND. TER., July 12, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $5, for which please send THE TRUTH SEEKER for one year and the "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book" to M. Penner, and credit my subscription with the balance.

Yours truly, FELIX PENNER.

DU QUOIN, ILL., July 21, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find money order for $3.20, for which send me THE TRUTH SEEKER for one year and "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book." Also send me "The Religion of Humanity Better Than Eternal Punishment," and "The Roaring Lion on the Track," and oblige

Yours respectfully, JEROME KNAPP.

NEW HAMPTON, IA., July 14, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose $3.50 on subscription and for one "Old Testament Stories Comically Illustrated." Also another dollar for one more copy of the above book.

In this church-contaminated town buyers of Liberal books are very scarce. The dollar for one of the books came to me from an unexpected source. This morning, while sitting in my front porch with a few of my boarders, the bell on a sinner-factory (church) across the street began to clatter. For saying that this was the Lord's fire-bell several of the young men called me a scoffer. In the discussion which followed I mentioned some absurdity found in the old Jew-book, and produced my "Old Testament Stories Comically Illustrated," as an invincible witness. It surprised them, and furnished amusement for fully three hours. After dinner they went at it again. One said that he got up sleepy, but the pictures had waked him up. Another said that he had been asleep for twenty-two years, but these pictures and what little he had read of the text had made him wide awake. Result, $1 for a book of his own. He is a photographer, and intends to copy Adam and his living plow, "Billy" and all, for a photograph in his show case. I fear he is a "busted" Christian. I miss no chance to throw a stone at the holy monster.

What Dr. Talmage Might Have Found.

OAK PARK, ILL., July 14, E.M. 295.

MR. EDITOR: Should any of your readers ever happen to be in Greeley, Col., and will call on Brother John Leavy, they will discover a veritable oasis of mentality and good fellowship in that desert of orthodoxy. Not that he is the only Freethinker there, but he is one that any Liberal will be delighted to meet. Aside from his own personality, he has a collection of curiosities "said" to have been collected by "Dear Brother Talmage" in the holy land, and which of themselves are worth going several Sabbath days' journeys to see. Herewith I append a list of the relics as described by Brother Leavy himself:

No. 1. Kettle, or hash-pot, found by Dr. Talmage at the foot of Mount Sinai, and supposed to have been used by the Israelites on their journey through the wilderness.

No. 2. Shako, or head-dress, worn by Simon, Peter's wife's mother, and certified to by Tontil Effendi, notary public at Joppa, Asia Minor, April 10, 1890.

No. 3. Frying-pan presented to Dr. Talmage by Hassan El Obid, of Joppa, and supposed to have belonged to one "Simon, a tanner, that lived by the sea."

No. 4. Whiskers worn by Mark Antony when on a visit to Cleopatra, and certified to by the good Mustafa El Haib, of Cairo, Egypt, April 29, 1890.

There are a few other less important relics, but as some doubts exist as to their genuineness, they are not mentioned or listed. They are as follows: The black stone of Mecca, presented by an angel to Abraham; a portion of the wing of the swallow that dropped the residuum that put out Tobias's eye; the stone that killed Goliath, and the jackknife found in the trousers' pocket of the widow's son.

The goods have the regular exporters' and importers' cards attached, and altogether are calculated to "deceive the very elect." In fact, Brother Leavy assures me that a Sunday-school teacher from Council Bluffs, Ia., came to see them, and was so impressed with the remarkable collection that she begged leave to make a descriptive list to show her class when she went home.

Fraternally yours, A. CHAPMAN.

More About the First Steamboat.

CLAY CENTER, KAN., July 25, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I write you this letter to correct a mistake of Mr. Putnam's, also as an answer to Mr. F. Steiner. As early as 1736 Jonathan Hall took out a patent for a steamboat which was never constructed. In 1756 two Americans, John Fitch and John Ramsey, broached the subject, as did Thomas Paine in 1778, wishing to introduce it on American rivers. In 1778 Mr. Miller, of Dalswinton, had the impression that vessels might be impelled by paddle-wheels instead of sails. Mr. James Taylor, tutor in his family, suggested such wheels be set in motion by steam. William Symington, engineer, was employed to build an engine to be placed in a vessel on the plan suggested by Mr. Miller. The experiment was made on Lake Dalswinton, Dumfriesshire, and was so successful that, in 1789, a large boat was constructed and placed on the Forth and Clyde canal and made the rate of seven miles an hour. Differences between Miller and Taylor prevented further experiment at the time. Symington, at the request of Lord Dundas, built another boat in 1802; made a successful voyage, but was obliged to suspend further experiments by the canal company claiming that the action of the paddle-wheels damaged the canal banks. This vessel, the Lady Charlotte Dundas, was seen and examined by Robert Fulton, an American engineer, born in Little Britain, Penn., who was accompanied by Mr. H. Bell, of Glasgow. He made sketches and drawings of it; went to Paris in 1800; proposed to Napoleon to place at his disposal the means of transporting his army to England in spite of wind, tempest, etc. His plans being rejected, Fulton returned to New York, built the Clermont in 1807 and made the voyage between New York and Albany. This is an abbreviated sketch taken from the introduction to "Hume's History of England." Says the article quoted from: "Popularly, the credit has been given to Fulton for being the inventor of steam navigation, but his boat was a copy of the Charlotte Dundas."

Yours truly, GEORGE HARRISON.

After the "Observations" Man.

MR. EDITOR: Having just read "Brother George's" criticism of my letter on bigotry, you will please allow me to reply, for I always read his writings with a smile, let the subject be what it may.

Whether he got a little seasick in reading my paper (as he did when he was on his outing), or whether the coat set a little "too soon" under the arms, I know not, but I much fear the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER will surmise that George may be seated in the stern of the same boat of bigotry that I wrote about. He says: "I would not cast doubts, though I have some on hand, on the authenticity of that communication." This is where his bigotry comes in, for why should he doubt a phenomenon without a most thorough investigation when the opportunity is at hand? Certainly such a cause as the one in question is at least worthy of investigation, and were Jesus on earth at the present time, and I had an opportunity to know for certain whether he was really God and was crucified or not, I would do even more than doubting Thomas did to satisfy my curiosity. Neither sarcasm nor quaint expressions will disprove a truth or the authenticity of a real phenomenon; neither will it keep an honest investigator from seeking to know the truth. It may, however, be like one whistling in the dark to keep up his courage, and answer the purpose for the time being.

Should George (excuse my familiarity in using his given name, for nearly all readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER must feel like brothers to both "Eugene" and "George" Maedonald) take time to investigate Spiritism and overlook fraud, should he find such (as I often have), and follow up his investigations by a study of spirit philosophy, and after two years of research he should find it to be a fraud and delusion, he will then please come out in THE TRUTH SEEKER in his usual "phunny" style, and tell us all about it, and we will all "laugh and grow fat."

I feel assured he will then have less "doubts on hand," and the communications will seem to him less of "blanked twaddle" than now. And should his "42 stout" ever pass "under the daisies," and his spectacular soul ever be permitted to return to earth, and use a "short pencil," we shall get no "twaddle" or "flubdub" nonsense, but shall all get "some comfort and information" worth having, and dead truth would come forth in such eloquent language that no one could doubt it as coming from George E. and the spirit world.

If Mr. Maedonald's definition of bigotry is correct, he must know of some greater bigotry than Webster defines, and I will inform Mr. Webster at my next "sitting" that he had better look a leedle out, and in the future I will specify that I only mean Bigotry Junior, and not the full-grown senior himself. To big a "Boo" is too much for a colt, and should only be given for a full-grown "hoss." As regards the "little sprig in colors," I see no reason why any one should object to such being drawn on slates, even by spirit friends, when I made a mental demand for it, and only got what I called for. "Consistency thou art a jewel."

I have since called for a communication to be given in colors on my own slates, but just purchased at the store, and received an answer in five colors, and the signature written with no two letters of the same color; this in daylight, without pencil, and the slates tied to the chandelier over our heads by my own hands, and which the medium never touched until after I took the slates down and read the communication in answer to my question.

The Second Coming of Christ, and Some Other Things.

LOS ANGELES, CAL., July 21, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Those of us who have watched and waited so long for the second coming of Christ were led for a time last week to think that the event of the ages had occurred; and you can imagine—but faintly—how our souls thrilled with joy and expectation at the thought of his presence, and the immediate realization of the millennium. The report that Christ had come at last was based on the fact that a tall, blond man, with a Vandyke beard, suddenly appeared in our midst, announcing that he was Jesus Christ and was born the day before at San Pedro. He further imparted the information that he had just come down from heaven, and was under the personal direction of the Holy Ghost. Just as soon as he made known these facts the police gathered him in, and the next day the commission on lunacy sent him to the insane asylum.

Thus do human hopes rise and fall, and the heart grows sick with renewed disappointments as we wait in vain for the fulfillment of the Bible promise and prediction. But this bogus event has not been without one good result; it has set us to thinking, How shall we really know Jesus when he does come? There are no authentic and reliable portraits of him in possession of any of the churches, and if the American people are to always be so suspicious that every man who claims to be Jesus is sure to find himself in the hands of the police, and be brought before the commission on lunacy, then something must be done to spare the real Jesus this inconvenience and disgrace when he arrives.

After wrestling with this subject of identification in prayer and otherwise, I have found the solution. Knowing that the same inspirational forces and extraordinary influences which controlled the writers of the Holy Bible are now with Heston in illustrating it, there is no room for doubt that his full-length portraits of Jesus are correct and accurate. Such being the case, all that is needed to stand off the police and prevent the possibility of Jesus being railroaded into an insane asylum, is to increase the circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER and see that Heston's lifelike portraits are universally distributed. The importance of this work can not be over-estimated, and the fond hope is cherished that it may be successfully carried out. I wish now, while I think of it, to say that I am engaged in revising the New, New Testament, and the work is expected to appear simultaneously with the revision now under way by the "new woman." So many mistakes are found in the original Greek, it is more of an undertaking than I expected, and at times I am nearly discouraged. The handwriting of the Apostles is miserable, as might have been expected from ignorant fishermen, and St. Matthew's reminds me strongly of Horace Greeley's. I have time to mention but one prominent error in his manuscript, and that, which is in regard to the immaculate conception, will show how clumsy and inaccurate previous translations have been. He says distinctly: "And Mary dreamed that Joseph was with child of the Holy Ghost; for all things are possible with God, even as Adam was the mother of Eve."

While this version of that event increases the miracle, it will not necessitate an increase in faith, for faith in religious devotees is as limitless as time and space, and the more they believe the greater their reward in heaven.

Now, in conclusion, let me call attention to the word selah, by saying that a cursory inspection of ancient Hebrew manuscripts confirms an impression long held that the word when correctly translated reads "whoop-la," and is designed to show the ecstatic state of mind that prevailed from spiritual causes, in the inspired author. "Whoop-la" has long been used by the Texas cowboy to denote an excess of spirits, but in total ignorance of its divine origin, which is now revealed for the first time. Verily the Bible is a wonderful book, and we don't yet begin to understand it; but let us not despair.

C. SEVERANCE.

Religion, Education, and the State.

NEW YORK, July 25, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: The posthumous paper of Professor Johnston, printed in the Century for June, 1895, suggests some thoughts that it may be well to express at this time.

In the first place, if the constitutional guarantee of separation of church and state is to be respected, all forms of public education must be absolutely secular. Equal justice to all citizens and tax-payers imperatively requires that the state shall not teach religion of any kind in any manner anywhere. The dangers necessarily attending and the disasters surely following state patronage of religion are too well known to all intelligent men and women to require elaboration here. The founders of the republic so keenly realized them that they so framed the organic law that every special privilege since granted to the church by custom, Congress, and the state legislatures is undeniably in contravention of the letter or spirit of the Constitution, or of both. There are three possible ways in which the state can avoid the entanglements, menaces, and turmoils inseparable from official indorsement and inculcation of religious dogmas.

(1) Develop the public school system along present lines, supporting primary, intermediate, and high schools and universities by taxation, and keeping all of them entirely free from the teaching of religion. This does not involve the elimination of instruction in ethics, for ethical principles are derived from human relations, not from religious creeds. Neither is it necessary to do this in "a distinctly hostile spirit." State education should be non-religious, not anti-religious. The distinction is vital. Because the state does not teach the peculiar principles of the Democratic party or of the Republican party or of the Populist party in the public schools no reasonable person argues that therefore the state is hostile to either of these political isms, that in the public school anti-Republicanism or anti-Democracy or anti-Populism is taught at the expense of the tax-payers of diverse political faiths. As regards political beliefs, the state is, in its educational department, strictly neutral, and it should be the same as regards religious beliefs. But there is a real difficulty in the way of putting in practice this theory of public education, a difficulty that is most clearly perceived from the view-point of the secularist. Of course there are other difficulties, and they will be considered later on, but they do not exist for the man who is convinced that the state is the proper educator of the child. They are the difficulties seen by the individualist. But the conscientious secularist, when he is also a believer in state education, must admit that Professor Johnston put his pen on a serious objection when he indicated the troubles growing out of the teaching of history in the public schools. However, the advocate of religious instruction does not escape this difficulty. It is a difficulty that has its source in the attempt to teach history in institutions of learning supported by the taxation of people of all forms of religious belief and non-belief. It bothers the secularist no more than it should bother the champion of religious instruction in school. Wherever history is made a part of the course of study in public schools there must be a conflict between Catholic, Protestant, and Freethinker. They cannot agree in regard to the facts of history, and no class can secure the teaching of that which it believes to be the truth without violation of the conscience rights of the others. If it is finally agreed that religion may be taught in the public schools the question is at once raised, Whose religion? If it be answered, Simply the fundamental doctrines accepted by all Christians (which would leave out of consideration the equal citizen rights of the Freethinker, the Jew, and other non-Christians), the difficulty of finding or inventing colorless history still remains. Neither Catholic nor Protestant would be satisfied with what the other would desire to put into the textbooks, while the Jew and the Freethinker would feel wronged whichever of the first-named sects interpreted history for their children. On the other hand, if the secular scheme be finally accepted and history be emasculated, as it generally is now, nobody will be satisfied. If, however, history be taught as the secularist reads it, we shall have what the religionist cannot fail to regard as the inculcation of anti-religious ideas, and his conscience rights will be trampled by the state. Is it not obvious, therefore, that history must, in any event, be dropped from the public school curriculum if we are to be spared the demoralizing spectacle of a constant wrangle among sectarians and the still greater demoralizing effect of the denial of equal justice which would follow the permanent triumph of any of the factions? But what is higher education if all historical studies are ignored? This leads us to the consideration of the second of the possible systems of state education.

(2) This possible system may be best described in the words of Professor Johnston, it being the fifth of the ways which he pointed out as open to the educators of the country:

The state may voluntarily restrict its sphere of instruction, and teach only the fundamentals of education, with manual or technical training, abandoning all forms of higher education, or of education for culture, to private competition, or to the eleemosynary or religious institutions. This would put an end to state universities, high schools, and all forms of gratuitous education except that which is purely elementary.

It would appear that this must be a great improvement over the present system. It would settle the question of instruction in history, for history is not properly an elementary study, except, perhaps, in so far as the outlines of the history of our own country are concerned, and these could probably be taught without offense. The existing system is overloaded, and is rankly unjust to the majority of the taxpayers, and beyond the strength of the majority of the pupils. The need for universal education in a democracy would be met by such a system, in so far as the state can equitably meet it, granting the adequacy of this common argument for state education. The children turned out of our common schools at the end of a few years have, as a rule, only a smattering of the common branches. Their time and energy have been consumed in studies quite often much beyond their immature capacity, and which they will not be able to pursue in higher institutions, although their parents are compelled to help support those institutions. Each year, at the behest of this or that group of enthusiastic specialists, the legislature increases the number of common school studies, and when some cool-headed objector shows the short-sightedness of this policy, he is denounced as an "enemy of education." With the system of state instruction thus simplified, would religion, as a disturbing factor, cease to receive attention? It is to be feared that it would still torment us. Of course, those who believe in the religious instruction of the young in the common school would not be satisfied, even if morals were taught, for they would contend that morals cannot be dissociated from religion without disaster, while there would be perpetual conflict between the secular teacher, on one side, and the parents and its other instructors, outside the school-room, on the other. The first would teach morals as a part of the science of human relations, and that they were discovered and formulated by man in the course of ages of development, while the second would tell the children that the moral code was given to the race by a divine power outside of and beyond man. It is thus shown that the tax-payer would be compelled, as now, to help pay for a system of instruction that he deemed inadequate and misleading, and to send his children to a school where his home training would be, to a greater or less extent, nullified by the instruction imparted by others.

(3) We now come to the position occupied by the extreme individualist. He holds that education is no part of the proper work of the police power, the state. He says that education should be left wholly to private agencies. He claims that emulation, with really free competition, will furnish us with far better facilities for instruction than the state has yet given us or can give us. He reasons that if the people, freely associating, can not develop and conduct educational systems that will produce satisfactory results, it is too much to expect that they will, when forced into involuntary combination, achieve the results desired. This individualist pertinently asks: If it is better that religion and industry should be free, why would it not be better for education to be free? He points out that the principle that taxation without representation is tyranny applies in all cases where men are required to help support schools to which they send no children, and he also shows that when a parent is compelled to send his children and contribute to the expenses of a school wherein a child is taught that which the parent believes to be false in fact and pernicious in morals, the rights of conscience are violated and the equal liberty of the citizen denied. Let the state relinquish the work of education, and we are done at once with the problem of state teaching of religion to the young. The individualist is not alarmed by the prognostications of those who fear that if the state relegates education to private enterprise the people will degenerate into illiteracy. The time has passed when, in a really free country, there is any danger of such a catastrophe. Given industrial prosperity, and the possible careless and indifferent minority will be slowly but surely worn away, for even the poorest and most degraded know that education is a benefit and pleasure. Without industrial prosperity, the apology for education which so many of the children of the very poor and of the vicious receive can only accentuate their misery, and sharpen the weapons with which they war upon the more fortunate. We, Americans, heirs of the patriots of '76, are the last who should be afraid of freedom in education.

E. C. WALKER.

Mortuary—Ovee Colwick.

NORSE, TEX., July 21, 1895.

Ovee Colwick, my respected father, passed over the silent river which separates this breathing world from the great unknown beyond on July 12, 1895, after a short illness with heart trouble. A large concourse of sympathizing friends attended the funeral, which was conducted by the Masonic fraternity, and took place at his residence on Neils Creek, near Norse, Texas, on July 14, 1895. His remains were interred in his family cemetery on his farm.

He was a Freethinker who had the moral courage to express his honest convictions upon any and all subjects. He was a pioneer in Texas, having settled here in Bosque county in 1859, when this section of the country was, comparatively speaking, a wilderness. He thus endured the privations incident to a frontier life. He was the first outspoken Freethinker in this community. Endowed with great natural energy and endurance he, although almost in a penniless condition when he arrived and settled here, secured a farm, and by his unremitting toil and almost herculean efforts succeeded not only in establishing himself and family, but ere many years had passed found himself in independent circumstances (as we consider it here in the country).

The following biographical sketch was composed by myself, with the aid of Alfred M. Colwick (my brother). This brief sketch of O. Colwick's life's career was read at his funeral by his venerable Liberal friend and neighbor, O. Olson. I'll let this suffice as a slight tribute to my father's memory:

Ovee Colwick (or Kjelvig, as was the original name in Norway) was born at Kjelvig, near Stavanger, Norway, on March 27, 1825. He was married to Miss Johanne Margarete Naadland on July 7, 1853. The result of this union was eight children—four daughters and four sons—all of whom are now grown and surviving him. Johanne, his first wife, after years of suffering, and a long and lingering illness, passed away March 25, 1881. One of his sons and three of his daughters are married and have families of their own. He leaves twenty-two living grandchildren.

The subject of this biographical sketch was engaged in the fishery trade before immigrating to this country—fishing, trafficking in, and shipping fish, having a small vessel of his own.

While on one of his fishing excursions off the coast of Norway, his ship was foundered and sunk in a storm, and he very narrowly escaped. He was picked up in an unconscious condition, but was revived.

He was successful enough in the fishing trade to save a modest sum of money, and so determined to emigrate to America, that land of liberty, progress, and prosperity. Accompanied by his devoted wife, he embarked for and arrived in this country in the year 1854.

While on the passage across the Atlantic, which occupied thirteen long weeks, he fell sick, and a number of weeks of serious illness, with board and doctor's bills, etc., at a hospital in Quebec, Canada, consumed nearly all his means.

On regaining his health, he went to La Salle Co., Ill., where he lived until the year 1859, when he removed to Texas and settled upon this place, where he has resided ever since.

He again married on Nov. 3, 1881, wedding Miss Mattie Erickson, and he has since had born to him two boys and five girls, all living except one girl who died in infancy.

On June 10, 1892, an unfortunate accident befel him which crippled him for life. He was gored by a vicious bull, and his left hip was dislocated, and the bone fractured to such an extent that he was never afterwards able to walk without the aid of crutches, nor ever free from physical pain.

He joined the Free Masons a number of years ago, and has ever since remained a consistent member of that order. He joined the Farmers' Alliance, and was a good and consistent member of that organization for a number of years. With the co-operation of O. Olson, he originated the Norse Mutual Fire Insurance Association.

He was raised and educated in the tenets and doctrines of the Lutheran church. In his numerous voyages and active business association with the citizens of the different towns and cities on the coast of Norway, he came in contact with people of various nationalities, each holding different religious views, and all equally conscientious in their respective opinions. This, combined with an active and thoughtful mind, led him to believe in the practical religion of deeds, rather than of theoretical creeds. He held that the universe is governed by immutable law; that, as certain as effect follows cause, every moral action sooner or later brings its reward, while all violations of the moral law bring suffering upon the actor, just as surely as transgressions of the physical law.

He was a man of positive convictions, and had the moral courage to express his honest thoughts upon every important subject frankly and freely, no matter how much, perchance, they might clash with popular prejudices. While living in a pro-slavery state, for instance, he did not hesitate, even at the peril of his life, to condemn the ownership of man by man. The industrial slavery of the present he likewise condemned.

He was a strictly conscientious man, intensely practical, and would never profess to believe anything that did not commend itself to his reason. Placing a firm reliance on natural morality, he ever impressed upon the minds of his children, both by precept and example, love for truth and right, teaching them to follow the path of duty in every relation of life.

He was an honest, benevolent man; not devoid of faults, it is true, but even his failings leaned to virtue's side. He was a good neighbor, a true and faithful friend, a devoted and affectionate husband, a kind and considerate father, and a good and useful citizen.

We live in deeds, not years;
In thoughts, not breaths;
In feelings, not in figures on the dial.
His life is greatest who thinks most,
Feels the noblest, acts the best.

Let me add that he endeavored to do his duty in every relation of life. He sought to teach his children, both by precept and example, habits of industry and sobriety, and the fact may be cited in attestation of his success in this respect that none of his children have ever yet been addicted to the use of intoxicating drink, nor do any of them even use tobacco in any form. They are all, without exception, sober and industrious citizens; and they are all Liberals. Instead of instilling or allowing any orthodox dogmas of religious superstition to be instilled into his children's minds (as is too often the case even with so-called Liberals), he ever endeavored to imprint upon their minds the principles of honesty, truth, justice, sobriety, and industry that are essential elements of true nobility of character.

Though an outspoken and uncompromising Freethinker, or Rationalist, he nevertheless enjoyed the esteem and confidence of all his neighbors, by whom he was respected without regard to their religious views or opinions.

Rest, rest in peace—a last lingering farewell.

Nod-a-Bye Town.

Twilight comes down, twilight comes down,
Ho! for the harbor of Nod-a-Bye town;
Drifting away on the billows of dusk,
Wafted by winds which are drowsy with musk,
A dear little mariner glides from the quay
Of the here and floats out on the measureless sea
Of the Somewhere—'tis known as the ocean of Rest,
And the quay of the Here is a warm, loving breast;
And the cables which slip at a sailing like this
Are knotted with love and loosed with a kiss.
Twilight comes down, twilight comes down,
Ho! for the harbor of Nod-a-Bye town.
O beautiful harbor of Nod-a-Bye town,
Your lights glimmer brighter as twilight comes down;
They twinkle and gleam through the gathering dark—
Bright eyes keeping watch for each sleep-drifted bark;
Your shores stretch away to the bloom-covered hills,
And the breeze tilts the blossoms and out of them spills
The fragrance this dear little mariner sips
From the chalice some Naiad holds up to his lips;
And he smiles as he rocks like a bird in its nest
To this port, which of Dreamland is fairest and best,
Where the silver-winged fairies at twilight come down
To burnish the beacons in Nod-a-Bye town.
O dear little sailor for Nod-a-Bye town,
In dreams or awake may you never be blown
To harbor less fair, to less fortunate strand,
Over waters less smooth, by breezes less bland.
By and by you'll sail out on the ocean of Life,
From the harbor of Peace to the waters of Strife;
Be tossed by the merciless tempest of Fate,
Or, becalmed in some tropic of torture, will wait,
With racked, longing soul, for some message of cheer
From the heart and the love which now shelter you here.
May you find in these arms while the tears trickle down,
As of old, the fair harbor of Nod-a-Bye town.

Auntie Bright's Lectures.

IV.—ORIENTAL RELIGION.

"Turkey is the golden land of stories," said Madge, looking out into the bright sunlight, then roguishly up into Auntie Bright's winsome face. "It is as full of romance as of green fields and forests. And I know an interpreter of flowery legends, who could render a perfect day more complete by favoring us with a translation." And she softly patted Auntie Bright's sleeve. Walter had just mounted the cool porch, and his face was streaming with perspiration. "Phew!" he exclaimed, mopping his heated brow. "What a long speech for a hot day! Hasn't it exhausted you, Madge?"

"Not to such a pitiable extent as you have reduced yourself," retorted his sister. "However, 'what do we live for if not to make life less difficult for each other?' And disappearing within the shady recesses of the house, she returned with a glass of lemonade. "All praise be to George Eliot for having taught me that line. And now here's to Cowper—'The cups that cheer but not inebriate.'"

Walter took it gratefully, and after becoming refreshed, he asked, with a twinkle in his eyes, "What do you want me to do now, Madge? You see," turning to Auntie Bright in explanation, "Madge never moves in anyone's favor but she demands an equivalent. What is it, sissy?"

Madge pouted. "I may desire the equivalent," she said, "but I do not always get it. However," as a bright thought struck her, "you can help me to coax Auntie into telling us a story, although you must admit that I went to considerable trouble for something I well knew you would not require coaxing to perform."

"My sweet, unselfish sister," returned the boy in comic extravagance. "Fair native of Altruria." Then turning to Auntie Bright, he said, in the same bantering tone, "Transport us, O learned one, back to the land of Persia in Asia, under the golden reign of the Caliphs."

"I hope," said Auntie Bright, very gravely, despite the soft glow on her features, "that you receive these stories wholly as legends, with nothing to recommend them but their value as pictures of the superstitions of that time."

"They serve only to impress upon our minds the truths you want to illustrate," said Walter, confidently, and Auntie Bright smiled.

"The peculiar charm they have for me," said Madge, "is the fact of their reproducing the vagaries and illusions of an uncultured and fanciful mind. To me the 'World's Parliament of Religion' was but a mirror reflecting a childish attitude of mind, whose speculations on the unknown were the products of imagination and ignorance."

Auntie Bright laid her hand upon Madge's sunny head. "A study of the earlier and more imperfect forms of faith, before genius, yet young, came to the aid of superstition and wove the intricate web of fancy, is an interesting one. Earlier Oriental religions were the parents of the Christian religion, itself an Oriental faith, and romance is the foundation of all. Brahmanism is the religion of Hindustan. Its creator is Brahm, and Brahma, the universal spirit, is the cause of all existence. Dr. J. Muir, in the 'Original Sanskrit Texts,' vol. iv., p. 31, gives an account of creation strikingly similar to the Biblical account. It differs, of course, and is polytheistic where the Christian religion is monotheistic. And Buddhism is similar. It is greater. Burmah, Ceylon, China, Japan—in all Buddhist religion largely prevails. Buddha is the prince of India, and his history strongly resembles the account of Christ. Buddha means 'the wise,' 'the enlightened.' He taught that all visible and sensible things were but manifestations of the deity. Christ's biography is a corrupted copy of Buddha's, since the latter was the antetype. The Christian religion was undoubtedly taken from the Indian religions, and the Mohammedan religion is similar, only more fancifully described and decorated. Bountiful immortals are their gods, and their commands: 'Think good thoughts; do good actions; speak good words; and worship no demon,' their code of morality. The caliphs were appointed as successors of Mohammed to see that their code was lived up to. That the caliphs, in their power to do good, lived evil, and abused their power is not at all strange. Enlightened people are guilty of the same error. But how they—the caliphs—did so this little legend will illustrate."

NUMAN AND NA-AM; OR, THE OLD WOMAN WHO COULD TEACH TRICKS TO A FOX, AND THE WISE DOCTOR.

A long time ago, in the time of the kings of the family of Beni Ommieh, whatever family that might have been, there lived in the city of Cufah a young man named Numan, who had a most beautiful wife. I say most beautiful, for that is the simple English way of speaking of the woman, but it is as dust to gold in comparison to the Oriental adjectives that describe her charms. We are told that "If ever there was a being unique in the world,

A second like which sure never was seen,
It was she, it was she."

This couple, we are also told, were "like two cedars in a garden of beauty," and further, that her loveliness was so lustrous that her face shone in the dark, which, I am a little afraid, may not be quite true. Still, it was long, long ago, and it is courteous to receive an old chronicler's testimony.

They lived in a palace, which, we are informed, was "like the garden of Paradise." The lady's name was Na-am, which you will be sure to remember. And it is related that, in addition to her personal beauty, she had a very melodious voice, and when she sang by the palace window the people in the street stopped to listen, and if they were not already married, they straightway fell in love.

Now the caliph, as a prophet, had declared his right to the handsomest women in the kingdom for his wives, and accordingly the officers of the state were ambitious to secure handsome women for him, and obtain their reward of choice gems. The governor of the city of Cufah was Hadjadj—pronounce it quickly, and show your good school training. He was called "the cruel." One day, passing Numan's palace, he chanced to hear her singing. He was enchanted.

"If that lady's face is as beautiful as her voice, she is fit to be the wife of the caliph."

In Mohammedan countries, women wear veils over their faces, except in their own household. So Hadjadj instructed his chief of police to find a woman who could, by some artifice, catch a glimpse of Na-am's face. The chief of police at length secured the services of an old woman who could teach tricks to a fox, so she must have been very cunning indeed. When the chief told the old woman what the governor wanted her for, she answered:

"If the object of your desires be in the skies, among the Pleiades, under the earth, or on the earth, I will surely find her and put her in your power," which was a very highflying answer for the old woman to make.

She dressed herself to represent a soft, a Mohammedan nun, a hundred years old. She put a shawl over her head, and took in her hand an iron-shod stick and went into the street, exclaiming:

"Listen, O ye people. Allah is one God! Listen, O ye people!"

Na-am, who was as pious as she was beautiful—she must have been very religious—admitted the tricky old woman, who succeeded in inveigling her into the house of the governor, who surprised poor Na-am into unveiling her face, which, we are told, filled "the hall with splendor." Hadjadj ordered his soldiers to seize poor, hapless Na-am and convey her to the caliph.

When the lady found she was deceived, she was struck to the heart with grief, and her tears flowed continually. Her beauty began to wither. The caliph was enchanted when he met her.

"Her teeth in brightness could make the stars envious, Rosebuds opened when she smiled,
Jewels were scattered about when she spoke."

So says the poet, and he ought to have been truthful, but we do not meet such charming women as that now. And Numan, the unfortunate husband! When he found that his lovely bride was stolen he shut himself up, and the youth faded from his cheek like the emerald-tint from an autumn leaf. He must have a skillful physician, said his friends, but how?

Now, there came to Cufah at this time a very wise physician. And the father of Numan summoned him to appear before the wasting form of Numan. The physician was certainly wise. He did not prescribe medicine "for a mind diseased." Instead, he declared that if Allah would assist him, he would find the lost bride and restore her to Numan. The wise physician soon discovered the art of the wicked old woman who could teach tricks to a fox, and learned where Na-am had been sent.

The caliph had a sister Abbassah who greatly pitied Na-am and helped to nurse her. She heard of the wise doctor, who, having entrance to Na-am, informed her of his plan to restore her to her husband. The young wife was delighted, and the roses came back to her cheeks. So the caliph had reason to congratulate Abbassah upon securing so wise a doctor.

Upon the advice of the crafty physician Numan gained entrance into the palace, cloaked and disguised as a woman. But he lost his way and wandered into the room of Abbassah, who exclaimed, "What foolish woman are you that, without permission, have entered my room?" Numan answered: "I am no woman, but a wretched man," and then in pitiful accents told Abbassah his story. Her heart was touched. "I will send for Na-am," she said. The meeting of the happy pair is described in glowing language, almost too flowery for practical people to appreciate. Na-am took her lute and began to sing. As she was singing the caliph approached. Abbassah, startled, threw a cloak around Numan, and approached the caliph softly. "O Emir the Faithful, I am about to tell a story. Listen! for I shall want your judgment upon the points I shall present." Then in a diplomatic manner, with a clever flattering of the caliph's vanity, Abbassah told the story of Numan and Na-am; the unconscious caliph appeared deeply interested.

"What did the caliph do, when he discovered the ruse?" He asked, as Abbassah paused.

She answered: "He drew his sword and slew them."

"What an ignorant ruler! The two persons were excusable. He should have learned their story and done them justice."

"Emir the Faithful, that is what you would have done."

"Yes, a caliph should be merciful and just."

"Then behold such a case before you."

Abbassah drew aside the cloak and revealed to the astonished eyes of the caliph a man.

"Behold," she said, "in the youth is the subject of my story, and this woman is the stolen bride. O Prince of the Faithful, by your own promise may justice pass by the innocent. The governor of Cufah has treated them as I have told you. What shall be done, not to these unfortunate people, but to Hadjadj ez Salim?"

"He shall be driven from the office, and the wise physician shall have his place."

"Allah is just! And what shall be done with Numan and Na-am?"

"They shall be restored to their palace, and Allah, who heareth the cry of the just, shall be praised."

The young auditors applauded.

"That was better than the lemonade," declared Walter, trying to tease his sister. But Madge was prepared to agree with him.

Hard Knocks at Christianity.

By R. WHEELER.

This book is just what its title implies—thumping whacks at superstition. It deals with the effect of Christianity on the world, showing what Christians have done to advance their religion and impede the progress of man. It shows that Jesus was a false prophet, that the gospels are not authentic, and that Christianity is a borrowed system of religion. That the Bible is not in accord with Science, and that the atonement scheme is futile and foolish, and that religion is not a real benefit to man.

THE BRAIN AND BIBLE;

OR

THE CONFLICT BETWEEN MENTAL SCIENCE AND THEOLOGY.

By EDGAR C. BEALL, M.D.,

with a preface by

R. G. INGERSOLL.

This is the only work of its kind in the literature of Freethought. Its arguments are based upon scientific phrenology, and appeal directly to the reader's sense of logic and love of justice. It is eloquent as well as convincing.

Price, cloth, $1. Address THE TRUTH SEEKER.

By the census of 1890, the above is the value of

Church Property

in the United States.

Should It Be Exempt from Taxation?

REASONS WHY IT SHOULD NOT.

Our pamphlet with this title contains an Argument for Equality of Taxation, and a Statement of Facts, giving, from the Census of 1890, the value, by Denominations, of Church Property in the United States and in the several States and Territories and in all Cities having 25,000 or more inhabitants; so arranged as to show at a glance the relative standing as to wealth of the leading Denominations and Denominational Groups. Also, much other matter of especial interest to certain Cities, States, and Sections, all comparisons being based upon official figures.

This pamphlet is the only one of the kind published. In no other work are the facts, figures, and arguments to be found. The figures, being derived from the Government Census of 1890, will not be superseded until the census of 1900 shall have been completed—probably about eight years hence. The arguments are unanswerable and will have the dew of morning on them so long as the injustice of church exemption is suffered to exist.

By single copies the price is 15 cents, but as the work is published specially for distribution by those who favor justice in taxation the following reductions are made:

Ten copies..... $1.00

Fifty copies..... 4.50

One hundred copies..... 8.00

OF Freethought

By Samuel Porter Putnam

Large Octavo, 1165 pp., Gilt Sides and Back, Marbled Edges. $5.

With The Truth Seeker for One Year, $6.50.

141 FULL-PAGE PORTRAITS!

Of the Most Eminent Freethinkers, of the Past Four Hundred Years.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY announced in October that this superb work was at last ready for delivery. It had been in preparation for so long that some of the subscribers were getting a little impatient and wondering when they would have the opportunity to see for themselves whether it possessed all the merits claimed for it by the publishers. They did not realize the magnitude of the work, and that the six months' delay in getting it out was due to the fact that they were to have fifty per cent more reading than they had been promised and nearly three times as many portraits. Such was the case, however. Instead of six hundred pages of letter-press there are nearly nine hundred, and the fifty portraits promised in the prospectus have multiplied to one hundred and forty-one! Considering the fact that the illustrations are the most costly part of the book—as undoubtedly to many they will also be the most attractive—and properly estimating the expense of the extra three hundred pages of text, it is evident that the subscriber received about one hundred per cent more for his $5 than was guaranteed to him. Well, the nearly eleven hundred copies of the volume subscribed for were sent out, and now we know what the recipients think of their investment. Judging by the letters that reach this office, they are not only satisfied—more than satisfied—but surprised and delighted that they got such a bargain.

As for the subject matter of FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT, it covers nearly every phase of progress and development and presents them in such orderly sequence as to give the best possible picture of human evolution. In Part First we have Freethought as a manifestation and influence; in Part Second, as an organized force. With this history are given sketches of the lives of the men and women who have taken part in the movement. It unites the past and the present. It is a world book and a home book. It fulfils the promise of its inception, and is the most magnificent work ever issued by the Freethought Press.

Price, $5. With "The Truth Seeker" One Year, $6.50.

WITH DAUGHTER'S BABE UPON HIS KNEES.

A new edition of that splendid prose poem "Life," by "the prince of orators," Col. R. G. Ingersoll. It is larger and better than the old edition, and can be framed or placed upon the table as an ornament. In the center of the card appear the portraits of the Colonel and the baby, surrounded by the prose poem, which has been truthfully described as, "one of the masterpieces of the orator and poet, who now, as far as we know, stands alone in the living world." It will make a delightful present, and will be a souvenir not only of intellectual greatness, but of artistic workmanship. It is printed on heavy board, gilt boveled edge. The size is 12x16 inches, and the price only 75 cents, post-paid.

Gems of Thought.

SWIFTLY the politic goes; is it dark?—he borrows a lantern;
Slowly the statesman and sure, guiding his steps by the stars.—Lowell.

It is not by turning over libraries, but by repeatedly perusing and intently contemplating a few great models, that the mind is best disciplined.—Macaulay.

SYMPATHY, which makes society possible, is cultivated by social intercourse. By habitual participation in the pleasures of others, the faculty is strengthened; and whatever prevents this participation, weakens it.—Herbert Spencer.

No matter though it towers to the sky,
And darkens earth, you cannot make the lie
Immortal; though stupendously enshrined
By art in every perfect mold of mind—
Angelo, Raphael, Milton, Handel, all Its pillars, cannot stay it from the fall.
—Gerald Massey.

SELF-MASTERY stands at the gates of personality. It is the key without which all protest for entrance to the realm of free living were denied. It cannot be begged or borrowed. It must be wholly your own. It loses its cunning in an alien hand. At your own waist, who are self-warded, must be belted the full equipment of freedom.—Horace L. Traubel.

A FEW months ago the Freethinkers of the semi-French city of Barcelona arranged a festival to celebrate the news from a little town in Western Aragon, where a gang of ruffians had attacked a supposed witch and dragged her about in a sack, till they were routed by the alcalde with a posse of local Rationalists. "What a sign of the time," said the orator of the symposium, "and what a step of progress since the days when that mob would have been headed by a procession of matabrujas"—official witch-hunters with their inquisitorial experts and fagot-contractors.—Felix L. Oswald.

By science man becomes acquainted with causes and effects of things, attending in an extensive and sure manner to his preservation, and to the development of his faculties. Science is to him the eye and the light, which enable him to discern clearly and accurately all the objects with which he is conversant; and hence by an enlightened man is meant a learned and well-informed man. With science and instruction a man never wants for resources and means of subsistence; and upon this principle a philosopher who had been shipwrecked said to his companions who were inconsolable for the loss of their wealth: "For my part, I carry all my wealth with me."—Volney.

VOLTAIRE was a man of humor, of good nature, of cheerfulness. He despised with all his heart the philosophy of Calvin, the creed of the somber, of the severe, of the unnatural. He pitied those who needed the aid of religion to be honest, to be cheerful. He had the courage to enjoy the present and the philosophy to bear what the future might bring. And yet for more than a hundred and fifty years the Christian world has fought this man and maligned his memory. In every Christian pulpit his name has been pronounced with scorn, and every pulpit has been an arsenal of slander. He is one man of whom no orthodox minister has ever told the truth. He has been denounced equally by Catholics and Protestants.—Ingersoll.

THIS undertaking for another, is the blunder which stands in colossal ugliness in the governments of the world. It is the same thing in numbers, as in a pair, only not quite so intelligible. I can see well enough a great difference between my setting myself down to a self-control and my going to make somebody else act after my views; but when a quarter of the human race assume to tell me what I must do, I may be too much disturbed by the circumstances to see so clearly the absurdity of their command. Therefore, all public ends look vague and quixotic beside private ones. For, any laws but those which make for themselves, are laughable. If I put myself in the place of my child, and we stand in one thought and see that things are thus or thus, that perception is law for him and me. We are both there, both act. But if, without carrying him into the thought, I look over into his plot, and guessing how it is with him, ordain this or that, he will never obey me. This is the history of governments—one man does something which is to bind another. A man who cannot be acquainted with me, taxes me; looking from afar at me, ordains that a part of my labor shall go to this or that whimsical end, not as I, but as he happens to fancy. Behold the consequence. Of all debts, men are least willing to pay the taxes. What a satire is this on government! Everywhere they think they get their money's worth, except for these.—Ralph Waldo Emerson.

READ AND GIVE TO YOUR FRIENDS.

Mailed singly for 10 cents each; twelve of any one, or an assortment of twelve, for $1.

AN ANTIDOTE ANALYZED. Reply to a Christian who had attacked Freethinkers, and exposing the inconsistency of Christians generally. H. C. Luse.

BIBLE TEMPERANCE. Showing that Liquor Drinking is Commended, Defended, and Enjoined by the Bible. Edwin O. Walker.

CHRISTIANITY A REWARD FOR CRIME. Authenticated by the Bible. O. B. Whitford, M.D.

DID MAN FALL? Is the Garden of Eden a Fact? Israel W. Groh.

EPIDEMIC DELUSIONS. A Lecture by Frederic R. Marvin, M.D. Giving reasonable reasons for Religious and other Delusions.

FALSE CLAIMS OF THE CHURCH. John E. Remsburg's most noted work, and one of the most effective ever written by any Freethinker.

FIRST EPISTLE OF BENNETT THE APOSTLE TO THE TRUTH SEEKERS. Written while journeying in and near the land of Yahweh. Containing the best moral instructions of the world from the great teachers of the former ages. D. M. Bennett.

THE GIANT DELUSION. A paper read before the Freethought International Congress at Chicago. One of Otto Wettstein's fraternal attacks on Spiritualism.

THE GLORY OF INFIDELITY. To which is added a poem on Thomas Paine. One of Samuel P. Putnam's most brilliant lectures. Every Christian who asks the idiotic question, "What Has Infidelity Done?" should be induced to read this book, if he has to be paid to do it.

HOW CAN WE BE SAVED? Was Jesus Supernaturally Conceived, and did he Rise from the Dead? Israel W. Groh.

INGERSOLL AND JESUS. Showing how the two agree. A poem by Samuel P. Putnam.

THE LIMITATIONS OF TOLERANCE. A discussion between Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, Hon. Frederic R. Coudert, Ex-Gov. Stewart L. Woodford, before the Nineteenth Century Club of New York. "Each man has the same right to express to the whole world his ideas that the rest of the world have to express their thoughts to him." Colonel Ingersoll maintains this, the others deny it. Mr. Coudert is a Roman Catholic, Mr. Woodford a Protestant.

MATERIALISM: Its History, and Its Influence Upon Society. Dr. Louis Buchner.

MIRACLES AND MIRACLE WORKERS. A Consideration of the Marvels and Miracles of the New Testament. One of John Peck's best books.

MOSES BEFORE THE COURT, or The Forgery of the Old Testament. Dedicated to the Clergy. H. J. Seignuret, M.D.

THE NEW GOD. "It is an open secret that man has always made his Gods. They exist in and through him, as the image exists in and through the mirror. Take away man and you take away God—the image vanishes." This pamphlet, therefore, is a consideration of what kind of a God man should make. Samuel P. Putnam.

ORTHODOXY. A lecture by Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll, and one of that great man's best. The subjects considered are: Orthodox Religion Dying Out, Religious Deaths and Births, The Religion of Reciprocity, Mohammed, The Destruction of Art, The Discovery of America, Copernicus and Kepler, Charles Darwin, Special Providence, The Latest Creed, God as a Governor, The Love of God, The Fall of Man, The Atonement, The Second Birth, Inspiration, The Reign of Truth and Love, The Wars It Brought, The Resurrection, The Judgment-Day, Pious Evasions, "No Bible, No Civilization," Miracles of the New Testament, The Ascension, Casting out Devils, Necessity of Belief, Eternal Punishment, Some who Are Damned, What I Believe, Immortality. This lecture is on the famous text, "The Clergy know that I know that they do not know." PERSONAL EXISTENCE AFTER DEATH IMPROBABLE. L. R. Smith.

PROCEEDINGS OF THE CIVIL RIGHTS MASS MEETING AT LINCOLN HALL, WASHINGTON. Being the Speeches of Hon. FREDERICK DOUGLASS and Col. ROBERT G. INGERSOLL on the Decision of the United States Court that the Civil Rights Act is Unconstitutional. Fifty-three large octavo pages, of which Colonel Ingersoll's speech occupies 33 pages.

PULPIT, PEW, AND CRADLE. So long as the Pulpit speaks to believing Pews composed chiefly of mothers, the cradle will be rocked by ghosts and the race will remain on its knees to a devil of its own creation and to a God who is powerless against him. One of Helen Gardener's brightest efforts.

THE RELIGION OF HUMANITY BETTER THAN ETERNAL PUNISHMENT. M. Babcock.

RELIGIOUS PROBLEMS. One of L. K. Washburn's best lectures, and it is, like all of his, very good.

THE ROARING LION ON THE TRACK. One of M. Babcock's comical sermons.

SCIENCE vs. RELIGION, or The Conflict Between Reason and Superstition. T. C. Widdcombe.

ST. MATTHEW BEFORE THE COURT. Presenting the evidence of the forgery of his alleged gospel. H. J. Seignuret.

SISTER LUCY AND HER AWFUL DISCLOSURES REGARDING NEW HALL CONVENT. Showing that Convents are inimical to chastity, virtue, and freedom.

SPIRITUALISM FROM A MATERIALISTIC STANDPOINT. B. F. Underwood. Written before Mr. Underwood joined the Psychic Researchers.

THUMBSCREW AND RACK. Torture Implements Employed in the 15th and 16th centuries for the promulgation of Christianity. Being the Nuremberg Collection, with specimens from the Holy Inquisition. 28 pictures. The descriptions and reflections by George E. MacDonald.

VICTOR HUGO'S ORATION ON VOLTAIRE, delivered on the one hundredth anniversary of Voltaire's death. Translated by James Parton, author of the Life of Voltaire. To which are added the three great poems of Goethe, George Eliot, and Longfellow.

WAS CHRIST CRUCIFIED? Austin Bierbower. A lawyer's consideration of the evidence of that alleged event.

WAS JESUS INSANE? A consideration of Christ's alleged acts which would lead one to that conclusion. L. K. Washburn.

WHY DON'T HE LEND A HAND? And other Agnostic Poems. Samuel P. Putnam. The title poem is perhaps the most popular of Mr. Putnam's many poems, and a great many editions of it have been called for. The other poems are: "The Golden Age, The Ideal and the Real, Not Dead, but Living, Fruition, Hope, Thomas Paine, Nature's Gospel, Address to Deity, and the short poem so often recited with great effect by Charles Watts, Give Us Light."

WILL THE COMING MAN WORSHIP GOD? B. F. Underwood; written before Mr. Underwood joined the Psychic Researchers.

WOMAN: FOUR CENTURIES OF PROGRESS. A lecture delivered at the Freethinkers' International Congress at Chicago. Considered: The Cause of Woman's Subjugation, The Canon Law and Its Effects Upon Her, Theology Never Helpful to Woman, Invention Woman's Friend, Freethought the Benefactor of Woman. Susan H. Wixon.

WOMAN: HER PAST AND PRESENT, HER RIGHTS AND WRONGS. A lecture delivered before the Woman Suffrage Association of Denver, Col., by B. F. Underwood.

Containing the famous Christmas Sermon by Colonel Ingersoll, the protests thereby evoked from the ministers who think they own this country and all therein, and Colonel Ingersoll's replies to the same. A finely gotten up pamphlet. Price, 25 cents.

Liberty for Man, Woman, and Child

"Reading this lecture," remarked a friend the other day, "will make men better; for if a man reads it one night on his way home, the next night he will take along some oranges or something to his family." This lecture is gotten up in the handsome style of "Voltaire" and "Lincoln," and has as a frontispiece a fine photo-engraving of the Colonel and both his grandchildren, Eva and Robert, the little fellow upon his knee, and Eva in her high chair. It is a pretty picture, and the Colonel's millions of friends will take pleasure in it. In this pamphlet is also the Colonel's Tribute to His Brother, which so many have desired to have in convenient form. Price, 25 cents.

VOLTAIRE

"Voltaire was the greatest man of his century, and did more to free the human race than any other of the sons of men." A lecture by INGERSOLL, with portrait of Voltaire. A handsome pamphlet. Every Freethinker will surely want it. Price, 25 cents.

LINCOLN

This is Colonel INGERSOLL's great lecture, printed in a handsome pamphlet, and containing the Century's famous portrait of Lincoln—said to be the best extant. Price, 25 cents.

SHAKSPERE

"An intellectual ocean, whose waves touched all the shores of thought." A lecture by INGERSOLL, with likeness of Shakspeare from the Kesselstadt death mask. Price, 25 cents.

"ARE all the animals in?" asked Noah, taking another look at the barometer. "All but the leopards," replied Ham; "and I think we have a pair of them spotted." Noah shook his head gloomily, and muttered something about "that boy coming to a bad end."—Cincinnati Tribune.

It is not often you hear humorous things in connection with the name of Sidney Lanier. His struggle against disease was so heroic and yet so pathetic—his closing years filled with such fevered desire to speak his message to the world before relentless Fate should seal his lips—that men often forget his younger manhood. But an amusing incident recurs to me now. Sidney Lanier had charge of the choir in the old church. The choir was large, filling the whole end of the church with its semicircle of singers. Deacons' wives, cousins and daughters had gone into it for generations, beginning young in the front row and gradually retiring, row by row, until they dropped out of the rear seats into their graves. Sidney passed through a trying experience in his effort to get rid of the discordant element and still to keep his place at the organ without duels. The feeling grew warmer. One day, as the choir came down from their places, they were confronted with a placard which read: "Swans sing when they die. Would that you were all swans and had sung."—Boston Transcript.

THE following story is told of a correspondent who has recently returned from a trip to the far West of the United States: Two men who had been sitting together in the seat near the door of a railway car became engaged in an animated controversy, and their loud voices attracted the attention of all the other passengers. Suddenly one of them rose and said: "Ladies and gentlemen, I appeal to you to decide a disputed point. My friend here insists that not more than three persons out of five believe they hav souls. I take a more cheerful view of humanity than that. Will all of you who believe you hav souls raise your right hands?" Every hand in the car went up. "Thank you," he said, with a smile. "Keep them up just a moment. Now, will all of you who believe in a hereafter please raise your left hands also?"

False Economy

Is practiced by people who buy inferior articles of food. The Gail Borden Eagle Brand Condensed Milk is the best infant food. Infant Health is the title of a valuable pamphlet for mothers. Sent free by New York Condensed Milk Co., N. Y.

Every hand in the car went up. "Thank you, again," he said. "Now, while all of you hav your hands raised," he continued, drawing a pair of revolvers and leveling them, "my friend here will go down the aisle, and relieve you of whatever valuables you may happen to hav. Lively, now, Jim."—Pearson's Weekly.

THE ELIXIR OF LIFE

is not in magic potions, "specifics" or electric clasp-trap, but only in Wisdom—THE SCIENCE OF HEALTH. Wise men study nature, shun disease learn to maintain vigor and regain it by reading the most complete book of Medical, Social, Sexual Science, by an eminent physician of 35 years experience. The "old, original, standard" work, endorsed by all, imitated by many, equalled by none. Inspired by wish to aid humanity, it has providentially saved thousands. Its essays on marriage, parentage, adaptation, marital failures, etc., are of inestimable value to all now married or who ever expect to be. The last edition has 1,000 pages, 3 colored charts of vital organs, 200 wood cuts, 21 chromos showing origin of life—development of man. APPENDIX has over 200 Recipes. A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—[Freethinkers' Magazine.]

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of his volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—[Boston Investigator.]

A small farm of 10 acres 86 perches, located within one and a half miles of Media county seat and within four miles of Chester, Pa., on the Delaware river. Several springs of soft water, good timber growing on the place, some choice apple and pear trees in fruiting condition. House and barn on the place, but are old buildings. Within five minutes walk of the railroad station, 9 miles from Philadelphia. Trolley line between Media and Chester, with less than five minutes walk.

The place is specially well located for a florist, and it would be a fine summer residence for one who would put a modern house on it. Eight years ago the land adjoining sold for $618 per acre, and no land near it has sold as low as that since. Several smaller places have sold at $1,000 per acre. The land slopes toward the southwest, overlooking beautiful woodland scenery.

THE PLACE CAN BE BOUGHT FOR $3,500.

COTTON is advancing in price owing to the bad crop reports and the decrease in the world's stock.

THERE is further hard fighting reported between the Turkish troops and the insurgents in Macedonia.

THE delicatessen dealers of New York have organized to resist the Sunday law as it applies to their business.

THERE is trouble between whites and blacks near Marietta, Ga. Both sides are reported to be arming, and some have been wounded.

ON August 1st Professor Heinrich von Sybel, the eminent German historian, died at Marburg. He was born at Dusseldorf, Dec. 2, 1817.

THE New York World figures that there are now available for use in the United States, of coined gold and silver and bullion, bank notes and treasury notes, $2,554,000,000.

THE Cubans are inclined to think that General-in-Chief Campos of the Spanish army is practically a prisoner at Bayamo with the detachment under his immediate command.

THE New York Grand Jury has indicted Sheriff Tamsen, his ex-warden of Ludlow Street Jail, and two ex-keepers, for misdemeanors in having allowed the escape of United States prisoners.

It now seems probable that the white men who killed the Bannock prisoners in Wyoming, and thus came very near precipitating hostilities between the two races, will be arraigned to answer for their crime.

ANOTHER massacre of missionaries and other Christians is reported as having occurred at Kucheng, China, on August 3d. Ten British subjects were killed. No Americans were hurt. The perpetrators were the Vegetarian order.

At Spring Valley, Ill., three hundred Negro laborers were attacked by five hundred whites, well-armed and armed and led by a brass band. Forty of the Negroes were clubbed and shot and all who could get away fled to Seatonville. Their homes, some more than a hundred, were destroyed and their furniture thrown into the streets and burned. The immediate cause of the trouble was the robbery and murder of a white miner. His assailants were arrested and jailed.

THERE is an alarming increase in the death-rate in the Whitechapel district of London owing to the scarcity of water. Women in the streets offer as high as six cents or more for a pail of water, but often there is none to be had at any price.

NEGRO colonists who went from the United States to Mexico are suffering terribly. Many have perished from small-pox and the rest would be dead of starvation were it not for the assistance rendered by a few wealthy men and the United States authorities.

THE foremost architect in the United States, Richard M. Hunt, died at Newport, R. I., on July 31st. He was born in Brattleboro, Vt., Oct. 31, 1828. Among other great buildings which he designed was the Administration Building at the World's Fair. He was founder and president of the Municipal Art Society of this city.

MAYOR STARKWEATHER, of West Superior, Wis., has been impeached for extorting money from the firemen and policemen. He was rector of the Episcopal church when elected mayor last fall, having been taken up as a joke by the Populists and unexpectedly elected. If reports are true, he blackmailed everybody in sight.

THE Shenango and Mahoning Valley manufacturers on August 3d voluntarily raised the wages of puddlers 25 cents per ton, the largest advance in years. For years the wages of puddlers have been dwindling from $8 per ton as a maximum to $3.25 as a minimum. But within six months the rate has advanced a total of $1, now standing at $4.25 for that district.

AN appeal is made to the press and people of the United States for funds to erect a monument at Alton, Ill., to Elijah Parish Lovejoy, murdered there nearly sixty years ago for his devotion to the cause of freedom. Illinois has appropriated $25,000 on condition that $12,500 more is raised by subscription. Lovejoy was a martyr to the cause of free speech and press. The antislavery issue was only an incident.

JUDGE STOVER, of the New York Superior Court, says that the court cannot consider the application for an injunction to restrain the police in the enforcement of the Sunday barber law. He says that this would be true if another department of the same court (Judge Brown) had not already decided the law to be constitutional. The courts are of very limited jurisdiction when it comes to a question of defense of the rights of the citizen.

At the last election in Belgium, under the multiple ballot electoral system, the clericals made great gains and secured the control of the Chamber of Representatives. Now they are pushing through a new educational bill. On August 3d the Chamber adopted, by the vote of 70 to 59, Clause 4, making religious instruction compulsory. A few days before there was a great demonstration in Brussels against the measure. A hundred thousand people marched in procession.

THE New York World of August 5th fills its editorial page with affirmations of and arguments for the fundamental principles of equal liberty. There are three broad columns of excerpts from John Stuart Mill's "Liberty," nearly a half-column from Herbert Spencer, quotations from the Declaration of Independence, the preamble to the Constitution, from Bolingbroke, George Mason, Jefferson, Blackstone, and many other famous men, and a clear-cut editorial.

CASTING PEARLS BEFORE SWINE.

Special NEW SUBSCRIBER Offer.

We wish, for two good and valid reasons, to greatly extend the circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER. First, we want its influence for good and its efforts for greater liberty of thought to be more widely distributed, and consequently more effective. Second, we want more subscribers to help pay its expenses and enable us to do more work. And we wish to emphasize both of these reasons. Our present subscribers can do a great deal for us if they will, and to get them to aid us we are willing to reward them; we therefore make this SPECIAL NEW SUBSCRIBER OFFER:

To any subscriber now on our list who will get a new name for the list for one year, sending us three dollars for the same, we will send free a copy of the FREETHINKER'S PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK, in board covers (price TWO DOLLARS).

And to anyone whose name is not now on our list we make this offer: Send us three dollars for the paper one year, and we will send you free the PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK.

The pictures in the FREETHINKER'S PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK were made and the text written to show the absurdity and untruthfulness of the Church's claim to being a divine and beneficent institution, and to reveal the abuses of a union of church and state. It has 185 Full-page Illustrations, with copious citations of Facts, History, Statistics, and Opinions of Scholars to maintain the argument of the Artist. The Designs are by Watson Heston and include a portrait of the designer. The pictures are classified as follows: Of those representing Uncle Sam and the Priests there are 16; representing The Church Robbing the People, 2; Thanksgiving, 3; Sabbath Laws, 6; Children and the Church, 11; Woman and the Church, 10; The Church and Thomas Paine, 6; Studies in Natural History, 4; The Bible and Science, 2; The Clergy and Their Flocks, 15; Piety in Our Penitentiaries, 1; The Atonement Scheme, 4; The Lord and His Works, 4; Prayer, 2; The Creeds, 10; Christians and Mohammedans, 1; Samples of Christianity's Work, 2; Missionaries, 5; The Lord's Instruments, 1; Bible Doctrines and Their Results, 25; Church and Slavery, 1; Priests and Politics, 2; Ireland and the Church, 4; Church Ideas of Civilization, 2; Uses of the Cross, 1; Unkind Reflections on the Church, 4; Persecutions by the Church, 9; Some Allegories, 12; Heaven, 3; Hell, 6; Miscellaneous, 7

This offer cannot apply to renewals. Premiums for them can be found on the second page of this issue. We are giving five dollars' worth for three in this offer, and there is no profit in it except that we shall get many renewals of these subscriptions; the subscribers will also, probably, buy a few books from time to time, and the small margin on them may make us whole. Induce your neighbor to subscribe, and so get the book for yourself. Or, if you are not now a subscriber, send us three dollars and get both paper and book—FIVE DOLLARS' WORTH FOR THREE DOLLARS.

Read what the papers and people have said of the book and see if it is not worth while to make a strong effort to obtain it. The book has had a large run; five thousand copies have been sold, and everyone who paid two dollars for it says it is worth a good deal more. Now we are giving it away, and you can get a copy if you will. Do not delay, but get it now.

What a New Subscriber, Who Has Received His Pictorial Text-Book, Says of It.

LAMAR, Mo., May 8, 1895.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: The "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book" is received, and after a careful examination of the work I unhesitatingly pronounce it one of the most impressive Freethought works ever issued from the press. It will indeed "corner the parson" and all his flock, and I shall take great pleasure in showing the book to my orthodox friends. As a reference book it is invaluable, and it should find a place in every Freethinker's library.

Respectfully, W. F. BARRY.

When Renewing Your Subscription, Take Advantage of These Good Offers.

For $6.50 we will send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year ($3) and S. P. Putnam's "Four Hundred Years of Freethought" ($5). Large Octavo, 1150 pages, gilt sides and back, marbled edges—the most magnificent work ever issued by the Freethought Press. 140 Half Tone Engravings of the Prominent Freethinkers of the past four centuries.

The object of this work is to present the Course of Freethought throughout the Civilized World from the time of Columbus and Bruno to the time of Ingersoll. It is a radical Historic Record of the greatest developments of the human race. It reveals Freethought as an intellectual, moral, literary, social, industrial, and political movement. It shows what Freethought is in itself, how manifold are its influences, and with what promise we can hail its future triumph. "FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT" embraces the most illustrious pages of human history, adorned with the brightest genius, radiant with the most splendid poetry, rich with the greatest inventions and discoveries, and ennobled with freedom's most shining advance. Nothing can be more interesting or more inspiring to the pioneer workers of to-day, to those who are still in the van for human rights and progress. No Liberal can afford to be without this book. It contains the greatest thoughts and the greatest deeds of the greatest men in one harmonious and magnificent whole, a vivid picture of man's sublimest evolution, with the added glory of woman's emancipation from the chains and slavery of a barbaric church.

Darwin and After Darwin.

An Exposition of the Darwinian Theory.
By GEORGE J. ROMANES.

A systematic Exposition of what may be termed the Darwinism of Darwin, and intended to be of service to the general reader rather than to professional naturalists.
Mr. Romanes is well known as one of the most interesting of English writers upon evolution, besides ranking with Professor Huxley in scientific knowledge and ability. And this is a part of his conclusion regarding the great subject of Design, to which the church so often refers: "Thus whether we look to the facts of adaptation or to those of beauty, everywhere throughout organic nature we meet with abundant evidence of natural causation, while nowhere do we meet with any independent evidence of supernatural design. . . . Adaptation and beauty are alike receiving their explanation at the hands of a purely mechanical philosophy. . . . All nature has thus been transformed before the view of the present generation in a manner and to an extent that has never before been possible; and inasmuch as the change which has taken place has taken place in the direction of naturalism, and this to the extent of rendering the mechanical interpretation of nature universal, it is no wonder if the religious mind has suddenly awakened to a new and a terrible force in the words of its traditional enemy—Where is now thy God?"

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with a little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroine. The narrative is, in the main, a history of a working-girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business-men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrites. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. The Bible and the School House.

"Back the Bible must go into the little red school-house, and the Christian Endeavorers must keep it there," said Dean Wright, of Auburndale, in the Boston convention. Quoting this, the Christian Statesman says that it expresses "the inherent and logical conviction" of the Christian Endeavor movement, and no doubt the theocratic organ is correct. But "the Little Red School-house" is a "patriotic" catch-phrase; what, then, are we to infer as to the community of interest between the various lodges and the Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor? Are they not all working together for the Bible in the schools, the control of public education by the Protestant churches? Listen to what the Christian Statesman says in this connection:

"This great movement [Christian Endeavor] is distinctively Protestant. It rests upon the open Bible. Its appeal is to the Bible, as of supreme authority in all moral questions. Its solution of the great problems of civil government must be, not a Roman Catholic solution, but a Protestant solution."

Then it quotes Dean Wright's declaration, and avers that he expressed the "inherent and logical conviction of the movement." All this being indisputable, it seems to follow that the great commotion raised about "the Little Red School-house" is simply a fight between Protestant and Catholic as to which one's religious views shall prevail in the "solution of the great problems of civil government." "A plague on both your houses"; we have neither fellowship nor sympathy with either. But it is pertinent to ask the Christian Statesman how it can have a Protestant solution of these problems when it rejects the Sabbath of the Protestant fetish, the Bible, and establishes by law the Sabbath of the Catholic church. More than this, the Catholics frankly say that they believe in a united state and church when it is possible for that church to be their own, but the Protestant theocrats pretend to favor religious liberty, although straining every nerve to utterly destroy it in the United States. Are they not out of their own mouths convicted of either rank hypocrisy or almost preternatural stupidity? Can they not see that if it is conceded that the Bible is rightfully in the public school, the Catholics may without blame put their Bible or catechism there when they have the power?

The Christian Endeavor Conspiracy.

The great convention of Christian Endeavorers in Boston has brought out into a still stronger light the determination of the leaders in that movement to Christianize the government. The convention was widely representative, there being present delegates from many parts of the world besides the United States. Out of the Christian Endeavor movement has grown the "Christian Citizenship League," an auxiliary organization intended to take the fight for Christ into politics, and this part of the program occupied the major portion of the time of the Boston convention. With these crusaders, "civic reform" means "Christian citizenship," the purpose being to unite all denominations in the fight for Christ at the polls. Last week we called attention to the fact that the Catholics are represented with the leading Protestant denominations on the executive committee of the New England Sabbath Protective League, and this is but one of the many evidences of the gradual but sure approximation of the various divisions of the religious army. They are coming together for the accomplishment of Christian unity, which portends the legal suppression of all unorthodox opinions.

"Mankind must be made to feel that it is absolutely wrong to divorce the sacred from the secular—to separate religion from politics."

So declared Rev. A. M. Phillips, of Montreal; and Rev. William G. Clark, of Chicago, uttered the same sentiment when he said:

"Practical Christianity means, among other things, a Christian politician and a Christian statesman. False to your nation and you are false to your god. Loyal to either and you are loyal to both."

"[Christian citizenship] maintains the supreme right of Jesus Christ to rule municipal and national as well as private life. The city, the state, the nation, should be governed by the principles laid down by him—principles of righteousness, of justice, of unselfishness."

That last is from an official publication of the Endeavor society. Of course we understand that the "principles of righteousness, of justice, [and] of unselfishness" here referred to mean only such interpretations of the teachings of Jesus as the ruling Christian power of the time shall make or accept, and that one of the chief of these "principles" is enforced Sabbath observance. It is indisputable that the millions of Christian Endeavorers are pledged to do all possible to compel the people of this country to accept the doctrines taught by Jesus. Jesus is said to have "laid down" certain "principles" which, we are told, must be applied to the "solution of every present-day problem." Has it not occurred to these compulsory moralists that Jesus—if such a man ever lived—is dead, and hence is utterly without authority over the men and women of the present age? The priest or legislator who attempts to force any person to accept the teachings of Jesus, either as they are read literally in the Bible, or as they are interpreted and travestied by modern Christians, is a traitor to liberty and a rebel against the Constitution which guarantees the equal freedom of all the citizens of the republic. Of these traitors one of the most conspicuous is Congressman Elijah A. Morse, who said in the Boston meeting:

"Another element of good citizenship, and conducive thereto, is a sacred, religious regard for the Sabbath day, as a day of rest and surcease from toil. The command given on Sinai, 'Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy,' was given for every nation and every people; for that century, for the 19th and 20th centuries, and for the 200th century, if the world shall continue so long. The command to observe it is side by side with 'thou shalt not steal,' 'thou shalt not bear false witness.' Christian Endeavorers, love and defend the Sabbath day."

The italics are ours, and help to call attention to the fact that "Sabbath rest" is demanded not in the interest of man but in the name of "god." Because an old writer says that the tutelary divinity of some ancient tribes commanded the "sacred," "religious," observance of the seventh day of the week, honest labor and innocent recreation on the first day of the week are to-day made crimes, and inoffensive citizens are robbed, imprisoned, and put in the chain gang. The report of the Boston convention gives plenty of evidence to confirm our contention that the church is now acting in the political field through auxiliary societies. We have been assured that not many of the churches have indorsed the Christian amendment program and the Christian citizenship movement. To this we have answered that the churches have not needed so to do; that the various organizations affiliated with them were attending to the political side of their work. It is merely an illustration of the division of labor. The dailies report Dr. Hoyt as saying at Boston:

"They should remember that Christian Endeavor is but a servant of the church; that the meaning of Christian Endeavor was to withstand drifts, to combat corrupt politics, to keep on saying that the politics of this country, city, state, and county are to be pure. There was another drift that would have to be met also, and that was Sabbath desecration."

Yes, the Christian Endeavor society is "but a servant of the church," as are also the Women's Christian Temperance Union, the National Reform Association, the Epworth League, the Divorce Reform League, the Prohibition party, the Boys' Brigade, the Sabbath associations, and a multitude more of similar societies. All these are doing the political propagandistic work of the churches. By "pure politics" is meant politics suited to the tastes of the Christian church, and it by no means implies that the opposite kind of politics is necessarily "corrupt politics." All heresy is immoral and corrupt in the eyes of the religionist, as witness the assertion of Dr. Hoyt that the "most immoral influence of the present day is the secular Sunday newspaper," meaning, of course, that it sets an example of "Sabbath breaking" that is very likely to be imitated. Read this from the Christian Citizen, the organ of the Christian Citizenship League:

"One of the significant signs of the times is the increasing number of young men and young women, all over the country, who are identifying themselves with reform movements of various kinds, and especially with the Christian Citizenship Leagues of their respective localities. In this way each local society of Christian Endeavor, or Epworth League, or Baptist Union; each Young Men's Christian Association, and each church, is being made a nucleus of reform. The demand for Christian Citizenship literature, for speakers on the subject, constantly increases with the increase of the number of those interested. Committees are being appointed by the young people's societies and charged with the superintendence of civic concerns. The churches, not as churches, but through their members, are readily and rapidly federating for good government and for the conservation of distinctive and imperiled American institutions, such as the American Sunday and the free school system. Sermons and prayer meetings and worship begin to take the form of political activity. The spirit of reform, defensive and offensive, is abroad. Let it stay abroad and strike quick and hard until evil is down and good is up."

There you have it plainly enough. Is it not very easy to see where the church is working and through what agencies? She is going to strike quickly and hard until "evil is down and good is up," that is, until such "American institutions" as the "American Sunday" are impregnablely fortified in Constitution and law. And what about the "free school system," which is one of the "American institutions" to be put "up"? There is no division of opinion here—"back the Bible must go into the little red school-house, and the Christian Endeavorers must keep it there," as Dean Wright declared in this convention. To make public education Christian is one of the objects of all these friends of "good government." Their sectarian purposes are thinly disguised when disguised at all.

There are millions of Christian Endeavor members and a million of voters. Soon there will be millions of voters in this society alone. And other millions in other societies. The campaign is planned. The Christian Citizenship League will have branch societies in every city, town, village, and ward. Candidates will be watched and questioned. There will be a concerted demand for such legislation as they wish, and what Congressman or state legislator or councilman will dare refuse? The Sunday fight is on NOW.

Church Property Taxation in Illinois.

"Keep up the fight on the Sunday law," says F. L. Chambers, of Augusta, Hancock county, Ill., at the close of a letter in which he tells us what he and another Freethinker, William Golm, have done to bring the Christians of that town to a realizing sense of the demands of justice in another matter—the taxation of church property. The law of Illinois exempts from taxation church property exclusively used for purposes of religious worship, but the good Christians, who are always appealing to the common citizen to obey their Sunday law and other invasive statutes, were not too good to secure the exemption, through the failure of the assessor to list, of the parsonages of the Methodist Episcopal and Christian churches, and the lots upon which said parsonages were situated. This property has for years been on the assessors' books, put there by the county clerk in pursuance of law, but the churches have evidently been very near the seat of local power, and so the property has not been assessed for taxation. Messrs. Chambers, Golm, and Samuel Farlow went before the board of review, at its session on June 4th, and demanded the assessment of the two lots in question, submitting to the board a decision of the supreme court of the state which defined what property was and what was not exempt, the decision fully sustaining the contention of the Freethinkers. The latter offered to assume all costs, including taxes involved, should subsequent proceedings declare their claims illegal. The board of review and the assessor positively refused to list the property. Next Messrs. Golm and Chambers filed with the county board of supervisors a statement of the case, with their protest, which was referred to the Committee on Equalization, and this committee reported a recommendation for the taxation of all church property in Augusta except that exclusively used for purposes of religious worship. This leaves the lots as they were, listed by the county clerk, but not assessed by the assessor. On August 3d Mr. Chambers submitted the question to the attorney general and auditor of state. This is his letter:

AUGUSTA, HANCOCK COUNTY, ILL., Aug. 3, 1895.

To the Attorney General, State of Illinois, Springfield, Ill., SIR: I have the honor to submit the following for your consideration, and respectfully ask your decision pertaining to the same, viz:

"The assessor's books have carried as listed property for several years, yet that official has never assessed, the following property: Lot eight (8), Block two (2), Abernathy's second (2) addition, also out-lot two (2) of out-lots, recorded by Joseph Weinberg, all in the village of Augusta, county of Hancock, state of Illinois, each lot being occupied by a parsonage, of the M. E. church and Christian church, respectively, and each being distinctly separate from the respective church buildings. The township assessor has been urged to assess this property, it being duly listed, and has replied that he would investigate the law and be governed thereby. When the board of review met in regular session on the fourth Monday of June, 1895, Samuel Farlow, William Golm, and the subscriber (all resident taxpayers) went before this board, when the examination of the assessor's books revealed the non-assessment of this property. In our plea for the assessment of these lots, we submitted (as read to the board of supervisors) a decision from page fifty, Illinois reports, Vol. 117, which distinctly defines what property is exempt and clearly establishes our demand as just, that these lots be assessed. In reply, both the board and assessor positively refused to assess these specific lots, we conjointly agreeing to assume all costs, including taxes involved, should subsequent rulings declare our claim illegal. We (William Golm and the subscriber) then filed with the board of supervisors on July 5, 1895, the following in communication [clipping from local newspapers] marked A, receiving through a special committee, appointed by the board of supervisors in their regular session, their report thereon marked B, both clippings herewith inclosed, which report leaves these two lots exactly as they were, as they have been continuously 'listed,' as recommended by this report, but have never yet been assessed since occupied by parsonages as described.

"In section 97, Clause I., Revenue Laws of Illinois, it is distinctly stated that the board of supervisors shall assess all property 'listed' by the county clerk.

"We respectfully appeal to you, as attorney general, for such action as is requisite to compel the assessment of the property, providing such action is not inconsistent with your legal requirements. And we would also request your opinion thereon. Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

The Hancock county board's failure to obey the law in the case of the Augusta churches shows what a "pull" the church has with elective officials. If all Freethinkers were as much alive and as persistent as our comrades in Augusta, the Freethought party would be much more respected than it is now, and the cause of justice would receive a great impetus.

Since the foregoing was written we have received copies of the replies of the attorney general and of the auditor of state to the protest of Mr. Chambers, and reproduce them for the information and encouragement of our readers:

"SPRINGFIELD, ILL., Aug. 6, 1895.

"F. L. CHAMBERS, Esq., Augusta, Ill., Dear Sir: Your communication of the 3d instant is received and contents noted. It is evident from your statement that the assessor has neglected to do his duty. There is no law of this state exempting a parsonage from taxation. It is not too late, however, for the assessor to make amends. He should assess the property at once, and return it to the county clerk. This he can do even after he has returned his books.

"I note the action of the supervisors in regard to the matter, and would advise you to present it again to them at the September meeting, and call their attention especially to the fact that they have not passed upon the question submitted in your petition. If the board of supervisors take any action upon the matter at their September meeting, and you feel aggrieved by the same, you can have an appeal taken under section 97 of the Revenue act, provided their action comes within the provisions of the law.

"In the meantime, you had better consult the state's attorney of your county and ask his assistance as a public officer. It is the duty of the attorney general to attend to the matter after it comes into the auditor's hands, and is certified to the Supreme Court, but there is no duty before this that devolves upon him in relation to the matter.

"If the assessor makes an assessment of the property it will, perhaps, not be necessary for you to follow the matter up before the board of supervisors. There is a case in Volume 57 of the Appellate Court Reports, page 681, holding that property may be assessed after the return of the assessor's books, which will give sufficient light upon the subject. Yours truly,
"M. T. MOLONEY, Attorney General."

The state auditor replied as follows:

"SPRINGFIELD, ILL., August 6, 1895.

"F. L. CHAMBERS, Esq., Augusta, Ill., Dear Sir: Replying to yours of the 3d instant, we will say, we have no doubt that the property mentioned by you is subject to assessment and taxation. The second clause of section 2, Revenue law, provides as follows, viz:

"All church property actually and exclusively used for public worship when the land (to be of reasonable size for the church building) is owned by the congregation."

"The language of the statute is plain and explicit, 'actually and exclusively used for public worship.' This language could not be construed to include the parsonage, even if such parsonage stood upon the same or an adjoining lot, because a parsonage is in no sense a house of public worship. Again, 'the land to be of reasonable size for the location of the church building,' for the location of the church building, the building for public worship, and not the parsonage or residence of the minister.

"There are a number of decisions of our Supreme Court bearing upon this question, in all of which the court holds that the statute of exemption should be strictly construed. In 26th Ill., page 482, the First Methodist Episcopal Church vs. the City of Chicago, under a statute more liberal than the present one, where a building the third and fourth stories of which were each in one large room and were used exclusively for religious purposes, while the first and second were rented for compensation and the proceeds applied to religious purposes, the court held the portion rented for compensation was taxable and the portion occupied for religious purposes was not. The court said: 'The meaning of the law is as applied to religious buildings and furniture that they must be used directly for sacred and not for secular purposes.' This case is cited to show how strictly the courts are inclined to construe statutes exempting property from taxation.

"It was the duty of the assessor to assess the property mentioned by you; as he failed in his duty it was then the duty of the board of supervisors to assess it as provided in section 97 Revenue law, as cited by you. As I understand the law the auditor has no power to compel the assessment of property, but in case any township or number of townships fail to return an assessment to the county clerk he may require the county clerk to certify the assessment of the previous year. I would therefore respectfully suggest that the county attorney be consulted.

"Yours truly, DAVID GORR, Auditor P. A."

So the protest of a very few Freethinkers in a little town will open the way for the enforcement of the law in the entire state and thus compel the church to pay its taxes upon millions of dollars' worth of land and buildings not "actually and exclusively used for public worship." The church has too many—one would be too many—unjust privileges which are intrenched in the law, but she should not be permitted to enjoy any not so intrenched, and she should be dispossessed at the earliest possible moment of those which are so intrenched.

Nauseating Cant or Dense Ignorance.

Belle Kearney, writing from Geneva to the Woman's Journal, describes her visit to the famous castle where Bonivard, "the champion of Genevese liberties, was chained for six years, to satiate the vengeance of the savage Duke of Savoy." She tells of the smooth, sloping stone on which the condemned prisoners were put to sleep the night before their execution; she pictures the gallows from which their bodies were thrown to the lake, three hundred and fifty feet below; in the torture-room she saw the pulleys to which prisoners were attached and drawn up by their hands or hair while their feet were burned, the marks of the hot irons yet visible on the wood of the column which bore the pulleys; she saw also the beam with the iron collar, the latter used to encircle the necks of the victims to terrify and crucify them, and in another part of the castle she was shown the square, railed opening through which prisoners were told to go and they would find their liberty. After proceeding a short distance they would fall upon knives which cut them to pieces, and their bodies would drop into the lake. Then this Christian woman moralizes:

"It was all so horrible! We were glad to get into the sunlight again, and thanked God that the sweet religion of Jesus Christ had turned cruelty into kindness, crime into charity, and made all men brothers."

This is utterly disgusting. Does not this advocate of woman's rights know anything about the history of Europe and of Christianity? Does she not know that for centuries the man who could invent a new torture with which to torment the man who had a new idea was the best friend of Christ's church, and was sure of heaven, while the man who was tortured was as sure of hell? Does she not know that under the rule of Christ's church the art of torture was developed to the highest degree of refinement, and applied as never before in the known history of the world? Does she not know that Protestant vied with Catholic in the work of torture? When at Geneva, did she forget that it was there that one of Christ's ministers, John Calvin, burned slowly to death at a green-wood fire; another of Christ's ministers, Michael Servetus, for a difference of opinion? Is she not aware that today the prevalence of cruel sports and the cruel treatment of domestic animals and of criminals and of those suspected of crime, is generally in a direct ratio to the intensity of belief of the people in the religion of Christ? And, finally, does she not realize that if orthodox Christianity be true God will torture the innumerable billions of his prisoners, subjecting them eternally to torments in comparison with which the sufferings inflicted by the Christian Duke of Savoy would be as the ecstasies of the blessed?

"Turned cruelty into kindness?" But slavery is only just now extinct in Christian lands, after more than eighteen centuries of Christianity, and men accused of crime are yet burned at the stake by Christians. Christian Spain and Mexico still delight in the bull-fight; and in the Christian United States pigeon-shooting matches are of daily occurrence; in Christian Austria and Germany horses are deliberately run to death in the play of mimic war, and in Christian Switzerland and America Christians send fellow Christians to prison for working on a particular day, in America even subjecting them to the horrors of the chain-gang and convict camp.

"Made all men brothers"? In Europe five millions or more men are armed and drilled and the nations are impoverished in maintaining these vast equipments on land and sea for almost the sole purpose of slaughtering fellow Christians on the slightest provocation. Europe has stolen Africa and is to-day partitioning it out among her nations, killing ruthlessly such unfortunate natives as do not know any better than to object. France is murdering Hovas in Madagascar and imprisoning American citizens who are under suspicion of having given information of her designs to the doomed people. Spain is pursuing her traditional policy of robbery and slaughter in Cuba. Catholic Christian South America is always cutting throats, and here in North America it is not many years since Christians took at the point of the sword all they could from their brother Christians in Mexico, while the echoes of our terrible internecine conflict still ring in our ears, a conflict growing out of Bible-sanctioned and Christian church-defended chattel slavery. At present our Christian teachers and rulers and preachers are inculcating the gospel of the brotherhood of man by arming and training the children in the public and Sunday-schools to fit them in time for the work of death.

Such progress as we have made—and we have made great progress since the sad ages when it was death to question the truth of the dogmas taught by the church of Christ—has followed in the wake of scientific discoveries that have disproved the assertions of the Bible and of the church regarding "creation," and of historical investigations and Bible criticism that have torn to tatters the remaining supernaturalism and much of the human records depended on to hold the people in the meshes of Christian superstition.

"'Liberty' means naught unless it means that others can do what we don't like," writes "Teetotaler" in the Sunday World. That tells the whole story in the fewest words into which we have ever seen it condensed.

Without belief in the immortality of the soul of man, says Rev. Father Cronin, "in days of darkness and desolation there is no cheering light in the everlasting heavens." Neither is there any brain-maddening glare from the never-dying flames of hell.

"Indoctrinate the masses with the belief that death is an eternal sleep, and that all ends at the tomb, and you unleash the human heart for the commission of every description of crime."—Catholic Union and Times.

The most colossal criminal association in history was the Christian Inquisition, and it tortured, robbed, and murdered millions of men and women because its members believed that man had an immortal soul and that to save this soul from hell it was necessary to mercilessly extirpate heresy. Until the Christian church can wipe out the damning record of its own unparalleled crimes it will become Rev. Father Cronin to chatter about the demoralizing effects of the teachings of the Freethinker. If he wants to learn something further concerning the restraining influence of the belief in immortality, let him make a careful study of the religious statistics of the prisons and spend a few hours poring over the latest edition of the "Crimes of Preachers."

"The American Purity Alliance" will hold a big convention in Baltimore on October 14th, 15th, and 16th, to "advance social purity"—by law! No doubt, its deliberations will be governed by charity, moderation, and wisdom. This must be so, for we read that "many of the ministers of Baltimore have agreed to offer special prayers for the success of the convention's work, and to preach sermons on subjects in touch with it." Who can have any fears of the impartial nature of the convention's discussions and the scientific value of its conclusions?

Among those who will read papers are Elbridge T. Gerry, B. O. Flower, Mary A. Livermore, and Anthony Comstock. With Anthony Comstock's methods of dealing with purity problems we are somewhat familiar; Commodore Gerry has great faith in the whipping-post as an evangel of sweetness and light, while Mrs. Livermore pins her faith to a shot-gun. "I come not to send peace, but a sword," the Nazarene is reported to have declared.

A few weeks ago we sent notices to those of our subscribers who were indebted to us on their subscription account, and we are glad to say that a great many of them kindly responded with promptness. There are many, however, from whom we have as yet had no word, and to them we address these appealing remarks. We want some money, and want it badly, else we wouldn't say anything about it. But the cost of getting out the paper has to be paid regularly, and it takes a good deal of cash. So we again ask those whose time has expired to make an effort to renew their subscriptions now—at once—right off—so we can have the wherewithal to pay some bills that are due. We owe some people, other people owe us. If other people will pay us, we can pay some people; and then everybody will be happy. (Quod erat demonstrandum.) It is very unpleasant to be short of funds with a great deal more owed us than we owe, but that is our fix now, and hence this reminder to those who forgot to respond to the notice. We dislike to mention this matter, but Necessity has no fellowship with Squeamishness, and we have to do it. We need the money.

The religious press and the religious editors of the secular press are making a great fuss over the alleged saying by a particularly atrocious murderer (or alleged murderer) that he is a "believer in the teachings of Ingersoll and Tom Paine." There is no very good evidence that the man ever said anything of the sort, but if he did he is a liar—that is, if he alleges or would have anyone believe that Ingersoll and Paine teach anything that would lead him to commit murder. Paine's teaching was "to do good." Ingersoll's is kindness and benevolence personified. Indeed, Ingersoll's revolt against the Bible and the Christian theology is perhaps as much due to their cruelty—something which shocks him immeasurably and which he abhors—as to his perception of their inherent falsity. And the Deistical Paine can certainly not be quoted in support of murder or injustice. But we presume that the editors will ignore these plain facts and go on stating that it was the teaching of Paine and Ingersoll that influenced the man to commit the murders. We wish, however, they would point out the chapter and verse of these men's works which help to such a career. They cannot find a single one, while we can point them to hundreds from the Bible, and cite to them thousands of examples of Christians who have taken human life. But we are willing that this man should be an Infidel if it will mitigate the Christians' grief over the thousands of clerical villains who are pilloried in our little religious brochure, "The Crimes of Preachers."

The poor care God takes of his representatives is scandalous. He has just permitted the cutting to pieces and burning of a dozen missionaries in China, and Christians all over the world are frantically calling upon the governments of Europe and America to act for the protection of others menaced with a like fate, and to demand reparation of China for the wrong already done. What is the use of prayer if it is of no avail in a real emergency, and where would a miracle be of more service to the church of God than in China at this moment? It is a peculiar business, anyway. God would not let the carnivorous lions eat Daniel, but he did not interpose to prevent the Vegetarian society slashing his Christian servants to death. He saved the Hebrew children from the flames of the furnace seven-times heated, but could not or would not preserve that missionary family which perished in the ordinary fire that consumed their house. Now comes the news that Rev. E. C. Wheeler, the Baptist evangelist, traveling in his car "Emanuel," was killed in an accident that wrecked the passenger train on the Atlantic & Pacific railway on the Continental Divide in New Mexico on August 7th. He appears to have been the only one killed, although several others were injured. The light shed by the doctrine of divine providence is too faint for us to read the lesson of this "dispensation." We could easily tell what it would be if Colonel Ingersoll or Samuel P. Putnam should be killed in that way, but in that event we should have the assistance of the ministers and religious editors.

More Books by Colonel Ingersoll.

The Field Ingersoll Discussion.—In 1888 the Rev. Dr. Henry M. Field—as genial a minister, perhaps, as the Presbyterian creed permits—wrote an open letter to Colonel Ingersoll, with the intent to convert him. The letter was published in the North American Review, and was replied to by the person addressed, which reply was also printed in that magazine. Dr. Field rejoined, and the Colonel answered that. The Discussion, which was entitled "Faith or Agnosticism," was subsequently printed in pamphlet form, and owing to the great interest taken in it, the edition was quickly exhausted, but not reprinted. And until now the holders of the copyright have declined to permit it to be reprinted. However, permission has been obtained, and we have received from Mr. Farrell a supply of the pamphlet. It contains over a hundred large pages, and is very neatly printed, bound in paper, and sells for 25 cents, which is low. Every one of our older readers will know its value at once. To those who do not remember the discussion we can only say that they should lose no time in getting a copy if they want a controversial treat. Dr. Field does not rant and call names in his letters, but writes as a gentleman should, thereby distinguishing himself above most other followers of the meek and lowly one. This attitude gave the Colonel a chance to write so as to reach the tender-hearted among the Christians, as well as those who can reason, and his letters are different from those with which he met the arrogant Lawyer Black's epistles, while equally convincing. The low price at which this pamphlet has been placed should lead to its wide distribution.

The Ingersoll-Gladstone Controversy on Christianity.—When the Field Ingersoll Controversy closed in the North American Review the Christians felt that their champion had been very badly worsted in argument, and the publishers of the Review engaged the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone to attempt to rehabilitate the Presbyterian creed. England's most noted man is a Christian in general and particular, and is famous as a controversialist. It was thought by the Christian world that, with his training, he might make some headway with the Infidel. He wrote a long letter to Colonel Ingersoll, which was published in the Review, and to which Mr. Ingersoll replied at length, and, it is generally agreed, completely demolished the greatest controversialist Christianity can produce. Unlike the discussion which led to it, this controversy was not reproduced in separate form by the magazine editors, but Mr. Farrell has at last succeeded in obtaining all parties' consent to its publication, and has now printed it uniform with the other. The price is also the same, 25 cents. Send here for it.

Myth and Miracle.—This is one of Colonel Ingersoll's best lectures, but never before put into print. Every one who has heard it will most certainly want it, and those who have not heard it will have a rare treat in its perusal, as something new from the Colonel, which also is something everybody is looking for. It is printed uniform with the other pamphlets, and at the same price, 25 cents.

Will the author of the lines, "There Shall Be Light," please send his address or another copy of the poem to this office?

News and Notes.

Plymouth is the great naval station of England. Here are the war-ships, the docks, and the great machine shops, in which about 5,000 people are employed. There are three municipalities which go to make up what might be termed Plymouth—Plymouth itself, Devonport, and Stonehouse. Stonehouse lies wedged in, as it were, between Plymouth and Devonport. These are in the county of Devonshire, and hence the name of Devonport for a part of the city. The total of this three-fold metropolis is 200,000. It has advanced wonderfully since the time of Drake, who sailed forth from this harbor and conquered the Spanish Armada, and decided the fortunes of Protestant England. It is also illustrious as the point from whence our Pilgrim Fathers tempted the chances of the unknown sea. I stood upon the very spot where they prayed for the protection of heaven and started on their momentous voyage. On the very stones at my feet are engraved the memorials of this one success amidst a thousand failures. I have much more kindly feeling for the Pilgrim Fathers than for the Boston Puritans. As a matter of history we must distinguish between the Pilgrims and the Puritans. The Puritans came afterwards and settled mainly at Boston. The annals of Cape Cod are not so dark and terrible as those of Boston. The Pilgrims were rather kindly in their religious disposition, and exhibited a tolerant spirit, and therefore I am able to render homage to the Pilgrims while detesting the Puritans and their infamous despotism. Had the Pilgrims been the ruling power in New England history, I do not think we should read its pages now with such blushes of shame and indignation. I cannot believe that those who suffered so much for religious liberty would have ever been so treasonable to its principles as were the severe and cruel Puritans. I will not honor the Puritans. I will hate them with every fiber of my being, unworthy as they were of the leadership of America. Let not the dishonor of the Puritans fall upon the brave and noble Pilgrims. It was not Plymouth, it was Boston that cursed New England for two hundred years with the reign of a barren and bloody theology.

Hence, as a Freethinker, I was glad to stand upon this historic spot, whence England gave its best life to America.

I enjoyed Plymouth and its surroundings. Here is one of the most beautiful portions of England. The sea views are grand and variable; the bays, the sound, the channel, and the vast, far ocean itself. The landscapes are equally magnificent—the hills stretching away in immense magnitude, fold upon fold, with fields and groves and fair dwellings to the distant horizon. I find a stalwart company of Liberals at Plymouth, who keep the flag flying rain or shine. I am entertained at the hospitable home of Mr. R. S. Smith, who, for many years, has been one of the leading citizens, both at Plymouth and Devonport. He was a staunch supporter of Bradlaugh, and here was the field of some of Bradlaugh's greatest combats and victories. In the early part of his career a warrant was issued for his arrest as a blasphemer while on the point of addressing an audience, but the police-officer was altogether too previous and laid his hands on Bradlaugh when he had uttered only the customary expression, "Ladies and gentlemen." As this could not be construed into "blasphemy" by any court of justice, an action for "false imprisonment" was open, which Bradlaugh, of course, pushed with his usual legal acumen and success. Determined, however, to utter his sentiments in spite of police and church power, he secured a boat and stood out a little from land and thundered his speech to vast crowds of people, while the officers of the law stood helplessly by, for it so happened that not Plymouth but Saltash, by some ancient arrangement, had jurisdiction of the waters to within a few feet of the Devonport shore, and hence Bradlaugh could not be arrested without a warrant from Saltash. The spirit created by Bradlaugh is prevailing in this community to-day. I gave two lectures on Tuesday and Wednesday evenings, July 16th and 17th. The weather was somewhat stormy, but I had fair audiences nevertheless. The reception was enthusiastic at both places, for America and England came together where, for the time being, in 1620 the ancestry of both separated for the sake of liberty, and liberty has triumphed, and the two countries are more united than ever, still carrying on the great battle for human rights. At Plymouth I lectured at Co-operative Hall, a very handsome hall in a beautiful and commodious building. The working people have carried co-operation in England to a wonderful extent and business success. This co-operative society at Plymouth started only a few years ago with seven members and a few pounds capital. It has now a membership of 14,000, and does a business of hundreds of thousands of pounds yearly, and has a big bank account, and money enough to erect one of the most magnificent structures in Plymouth. It borrows money at five per cent and loans at four per cent, the object of which apparently uncommercial transaction is to give the workingman a good chance to invest his money if he has any, and if not, to borrow at reasonable rates, and the difference in interest is made up by the profits of the trade on the funds invested. Mr. Goodenough is one of the original members of this Association, and has done more for its progress than any other. He is a staunch Freethinker, one of the first to take a stand with Bradlaugh and Holyoake, both for Freethought and co-operation.

With my host, Mr. Smith, and Mr. Pearce, a young friend, of Plymouth, I take a voyage over to Saltash, along the harbor of Devonport, which is alive with craft of almost every kind. But that which principally attracts my attention are the enormous three-deckers. These used to be the crack war vessels of the British navy. It was on one of these three-deckers that Nelson went thundering against the enemy. They are no longer of any service, magnificent as they appear. They are now used as training ships. Saltash is a quaint old town, low buildings and narrow, steep streets. It was a climb to get to the top of them, but the open country was lovely, although it was raining at the time. We could see the misty ocean, the various shores, and Mount Edgcombe splendidly towering amidst the clouds and sunshine alternating. We traveled to an ancient monastery, entered the little church, and saw a cowed monk kneel before the crucifix and utter his pater noster and count his beads. How any man could be such a fool in this the nineteenth century I could not understand. It does convince one of the enormous foolishness of the human race to see such an institution as the church of Rome, with its ten thousand monks and melancholy nuns, flourish and increase. What reward is there for its votaries except a bare and miserable life like that of the poor devotee I looked upon with pity and contempt?

In contrast with the monastery is the huge railroad bridge, from Devonshire side to Cornwall, built by Brunell, 150 feet high, a tubular suspension bridge capable of bearing 1,000,000 tons. It is a brilliant triumph of engineering skill, and as we look upon its stupendous framework, so massive and so graceful and so useful, we recover our faith in human nature and its splendid possibilities. Rome must fail, and reason triumph.

Thursday, after the lectures, I had quite a day for sight-seeing with Mr. Smith. First we visited the government shops, where the machines cut iron as if it were wood, the knife going straight through the ponderous masses with irresistible keenness. In these vast shops are built the modern war vessels, the tower-ships, the torpedo-boats, etc. We are permitted to enter some of these tremendous engine-rooms, and to see how the superb and destructive instruments work, so that no floating timber whatever can resist them, only solid iron and steel. In the afternoon I set sail from the Barbican, which the Mayflower touched with her keel, and landing on the other side of the harbor, am met by Mr. Couch with his carriage, and together we take a drive over the Devonshire hills, where the famous cows roam that give eighteen quarts of milk per day. This is the finest country in the world for cows, the south of England, pleasant and comfortable, with the Gulf stream to keep it warm in winter.

We drive through many winding ways, up the hills, and reach Stadden heights, and here certainly is one of the most beautiful, extensive, and varied views to be seen anywhere on the globe. Before us is the great city itself, with its ten thousand dwellings, its fort, Eddystone lighthouse, Plymouth Hoe, the hotels, wharves, etc. To the right are Dartmoor and its vast ranges, from whence comes the river Plym, which gives the name to the city, the mouth of the Plym. To the left are the vast sheets of water, the port of Devon, by the side of wooded Edgcombe, the outer harbor and the breakwater, which it took thirty years to construct. Beyond the breakwater the English channel appears, sweeping into bays along the far-circling shores, and in the misty distance rolls the Atlantic itself. And all these shining liquid surfaces are covered with hundreds of ships, fishing-smacks, boats, steamers, sailing-vessels, ponderous iron-clads, and magnificent floating palaces, that are voyaging to Australia and America. Fifty miles seaward and fifty miles landward the prospects crowd upon the view. It is not simply the magnitude, but the infinitesimal variety that attracts. The grandeur and vastness of nature are realized, with the art and glory of man himself. At one moment we can imagine ourselves in absolute isolation, and in the next we are enchanted with the elegance of civilization.

The old Eddystone lighthouse was rebuilt and placed upon a public square. I visited this and climbed to the top and enjoyed the splendid outlook. I also wandered around the old port, which held out against the king in Cromwell times. I looked upon the statue of Sir Francis Drake, one of the mighty sea-gods, or "sea-dogs," of English history, the man of valor and genius, who did more than all the winds of heaven, or a thousand deities, to smash the Spanish Armada and save English soil from foreign foot.

I cannot describe all that I experience at Devonport and Plymouth. They are places of historic association and living beauty. I like the comrades here. Mr. Berry, Mr. James Couch, Mr. Pascoe, Mr. Pearce, etc., all are ardent supporters of Freethought and willing to do their share. I must thank Mr. and Mrs. Smith for their generous entertainment. I leave Plymouth with delightful memories. It was the home of Mr. Foote in the days of his youth; and certainly Plymouth is a good place to cultivate the burning thought, and fit one for the arena of freedom.

After Plymouth is Birmingham, great, busy, massive Birmingham; a well built city. Some say it is the best governed city in the world. However, it costs something. The rates are one shilling and sixpence to the pound. No Yankee could stand that. Birmingham is what you might call an all-round city. It has no specialty like Manchester, Liverpool, or Sheffield. It manufactures almost everything. There is an air of universality about it. It is a ponderous, prodigious combination of all sorts of industrial matters. I like it, and enjoyed my stay to the utmost. There was plenty of life about it. I felt that I was in the heart of a great commonwealth, in the midst of intelligent and go-ahead people. I know, of course, that Birmingham is not right on the political question. It has gone Conservativ. But what's politics to business? Politics is on the surface, and there's not so much difference between the parties after all. We will let politics go and study Birmingham from a business and social point of view, and I must say that notwithstanding the prognostications of some of my Liberal friends, I have a great deal of faith in Birmingham. It has a population of 500,000. It is always on the increase. It has a vast and splendid country about it. It must ever be the center of an immense business community. It has a basis of solid and permanent prosperity. Looking at it from a general standpoint, as a traveler and citizen of the world, I must admire Birmingham.

And the Freethinkers here are of the right sort. I never had a better time in my life. I arrived on Friday evening, July 19th. I am met at the station by Mr. Taylor, president of the society, Mr. Partridge, secretary, and Mr. Ridgeway, an old Freethinker, who has the look and bearing of Bradlaugh himself, and has really been taken for Bradlaugh at times. Mr. H. Lees Sumner, of Shirley, near Birmingham, is also at hand. My first welcome is a most cordial one. I am invited for the time being to accept the hospitality of Mr. Sumner, which I do, and we take an omnibus for Shirley, which is about six miles off; and I thoroughly enjoy the evening ride through the busy and amply lighted streets of Birmingham into the quiet of the suburbs and the wide prospects of the expanding country. After the stage ride we have a walk through the woods and rural darkness to the bright and shining fireside of my friend, who in the midst of his intense activities enjoys the felicity of green fields and secluded gardens. He likes a good long walk after his day's work. I was indeed delighted to be so far out in the country, and revel in almost absolute repose. I was warmly welcomed by Mrs. Sumner, and the little baby, only five weeks old, did not seem to be at all afraid of the Pilgrim. I could rest to my heart's content in this genial home, and did so. I let the sun rise high on Saturday morn, before I buckled on the harness. It was somewhat showery, and the masses of cloud hung along the horizon; but the blue sky was not altogether conquered, and dashes of sunlight checked the scene. I was again on top of the stage with four horses in front, and the chariot rolled along firmly with the best whip in the country to guide the mettlesome steeds, who seemed to delight in the freshness of the atmosphere and the occasional thunder and lightning.

Saturday afternoon I visit some of the notable places of Birmingham, the library, art gallery, the Bull Ring, the market, the Arcades, the town hall, etc. In the evening I call upon Mr. Daniel Baker, who, for years, has been one of the main supporters of Freethought in Birmingham, and has given much of his wealth to aid the work, especially when

Mr. Watts labored here, with much success, amidst many discouragements, keeping the cause vigorously at the front. Mr. Baker is over eighty years old now, but the "sweep of years" does not destroy his hope for humanity, nor his devotion to truth. I was pleased, too, to meet his daughter. His wife is now upon a sick bed. Also here, for the first time, I met George Jacob Holyoake, who, for sixty years, has been a Freethought agitator. He is over eighty years of age, but the intellectual fire is not diminished. He is keen, alert, ready to lend a hand. To lend a hand has, in fact, been one of the great purposes of his life. Perhaps no man understands better than does Mr. Holyoake the science of co-operation, not as a religionist, but as a man of the world. In youth he suffered martyrdom on account of his outspoken Atheism, and he stands firmly today by the principles he then enunciated. He does not indulge in any sentimentalities of religion. He does not believe in them. He makes no compromise with Christianity. He has done what he could to prevent the priest from assuming the mastership of the co-operative movement. And he has succeeded. So far as I can discover, the religious element has been kept out of this co-operative movement in England, much more than in America. The curse of labor reform in our country is that priests are allowed to run it. Mr. Holyoake saw this danger and guarded against it over forty years ago. In all his associations with the reform party he has not denied his Atheism. I should judge that Mr. Holyoake was a good deal like our Horace Seaver. He has the gift of pertinacity and of resoluteness. If he makes up his mind to a thing, he stands by it, and all the opposition in the world would not induce him to change. If he makes up his mind to live to be a hundred years old, I guess he will do it. He came to Birmingham on purpose to be present and preside at my lectures, which afforded me great gratification, for knowing Mr. Holyoake by reputation for so many years, I desired to see him face to face, and to stand together with him in the ranks of Freethought.

The friends at Birmingham did the best they could; but it rained on Sunday, and the audiences were not large. It cleared off somewhat by evening, so that at the closing lecture there was nearly a hall full. I gave three lectures. Mr. Holyoake presided at the morning meeting. He said that as Birmingham was his native place he wanted to meet the representative of American Freethought and give him a welcome to Birmingham. The short address of Mr. Holyoake was received with the greatest enthusiasm, and it was certainly a stimulation to my own effort; and if it did storm outside there was sunshine within. I lectured on "The Bible and Modern Thought." In the afternoon Mr. Ridgway presided. I gave my lecture on "Christ and the Nineteenth Century." The method of the lecture was to accept the validity of the orthodox record, the four gospels, and then to discover what value, if any, Jesus was to the nineteenth century. I demonstrated from the record that Jesus was ignorant, superstitious, fanatical, immoral, and utterly unworthy of the intellectual respect of the present times. Of course my Christian critics after the debate quoted Mill and Renan. I answered that neither Mill nor Renan was an authority in Freethought, and that on this point I considered them entirely unhistoric and unscientific. It is nonsense for any man to-day to talk of the commanding excellence of Jesus. It is false whoever utters it, be he Renan, or Mill, or any the most illustrious of Freethinkers. The moral excellence of Jesus is one of the humbugs of the ages, and ought to be demolished with all the force of truth and intellectual sincerity. One man tried to come at me with the miracle of the resurrection, and wanted to know what became of the body of Jesus after it disappeared from the tomb. I answered that the body of Jesus, whatever became of it, had nothing to do with the question at issue, which was the moral character of Jesus as given in the gospels which I had demonstrated, according to the gospels themselves, to be valueless and opposed to the progress of to-day. My opponent sat down. He could not stand up for the Jesus of the gospel; only for an imaginary Jesus. There is not a Christian to-day who obeys or tries to obey the teachings of Jesus. The discussion was somewhat animated. In the evening I lectured on "Christianity and Woman." There was some debate after this, wandering as usual all over the universe and scarcely touching the points I made. One critic inquired if I did not think that Miss Willard and Lady Somerset were doing a great deal for the temperance cause. I answered, "No; that they rather had injured the rational temperance movement by their foolish and tyrannical methods; that the true method of temperance was science and education, and not coercion and sentimental gush. Of all methods of temperance that of prohibition is the most orthodox, despotic, and unsuccessful."

Mr. Holyoake closed the evening with a short address; and really, as my friends say, he was never in better form. He was animated by the occasion, and the audience responded to his keen thrusts with hearty appreciation. A vote of thanks was given him by the audience.

On the platform also with Mr. Holyoake was another veteran and well-known Freethinker, Mr. Charles C. Cattell, a broad-browed man, gray with years, who looks as if he could strike many a strong blow for mental emancipation. I was glad to meet one whose writings I had read with so much profit—writings clear, logical, and to the point. There is a young and vigorous element at Birmingham, but it is seldom that four such veterans gather on one occasion as George Jacob Holyoake, Charles C. Cattell, Daniel Baker, and Joseph H. Ridgway. All honor to those who have made it easier for our footsteps to press forward in the thorny pathway of reform. After the lecture a few of us met at the house of Mr. C. H. Cattell and enjoyed a sociable union for an hour or so. Mrs. C. H. Cattell is the daughter of Charles Watts, as is also Mrs. Curtis, who was present. We all wished that Charles Watts was with us on this occasion, with President Taylor and other jovial spirits.

Thus the campaign at Birmingham closed with brightness and cheer. I have made friends whom I shall remember always. Among the workers here, besides those already mentioned, are Robert Meridith, David Thos. Bullows, S. Armfield, who made the Pilgrim welcome to his home; W. T. Pitt, J. H. Bridges, Mr. Stepton, Mr. J. Terry, etc. Mrs. Armfield and Miss Lillie Pitt, are also active in the ranks, with other ladies who are not afraid to be counted as Freethinkers. There have been many ups and downs for the cause at Birmingham, but there is still a good chance of winning the day, despite apathy, boycott, and various other things too numerous to mention that are always in the path of reform. In a city like Birmingham where so many elements are in play, where there are so many quasi-reforms and half-movements, the straight-out and pioneer rank cannot always advance. There will be drawbacks, but while the veterans pass off the stage, I am sure that youth will take their place with undiminished fire and with wider advantages for action.

I cannot write of the "Shakspeare day" in this letter, the richest of all days, perhaps, in mortal existence. With Birmingham comes Shakspeare, for Stratford-upon-Avon is only a few miles distant, and with choice friends I spend a whole day in that land of poesy, and a thousand thoughts throng into my mind.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Oregon Secular Union—Annual Convention.

The Seventh Annual Convention of the Oregon State Secular Union will be held at Portland, Or., on Friday, Saturday, and Sunday, September 20th, 21st, and 22d, 1895.

All delegates and other Liberals attending the Convention will be hospitably entertained by the Women's Auxiliary of the First Secular Church of Portland, conditional only on their writing the secretary of the Union, giving name and time of their arrival, when they will be met by a committee. The Portland Industrial Exposition opens on the same day, which will enable visitors to take advantage of reduced fares. It is proposed that morning and afternoon sessions—except on Sunday morning, which is to be awarded to the Sunday-school work—shall be devoted to the practical business of the convention; evenings to be taken up with lectures, a dramatic entertainment, and a dance. The business meetings will be held at Labor Council Hall, Union Block, corner of Stark and First streets. The evening entertainments, to which the general public is invited, will be in the largest and best available halls in the city. Definite arrangements have been made for music and singing of the highest order. The theatrical performance will be given by the Portland Dramatic Club, an auxiliary of the First Secular Church—Charles Hagner president, C. B. Reynolds stage manager. Sunday morning, Sept. 22d, will afford opportunity to observe the workings of our Secular Sunday-school, with its lessons, music, recitations, calisthenics, flag drill, etc. As secretary and a worker in this field, I would respectfully call attention to a few of the most important and pressing matters to be acted upon by the convention:

1. It is a matter for reproach that Liberals, as Liberals, have made no provisions for widows and orphans left destitute. If Liberals join any of the co-operative benevolent insurance orders they have to subscribe to Bible oaths, prayers, and other Christian mummery. We should have a co-operative insurance society of our own, somewhat after the order of A. O. U. W., but without high salaries to officers, and with provision so that in case of severe or long continued sickness or permanent disability relief could be assured. There should also be a reserve fund, so that in case of epidemic the cost per year could not exceed the stipulated sum, and so arranged that a policy would have actual cash value and not be forfeited after years of paying dues and assessments. It should of course include women as well as men. The matter needs serious thought and should be thoroughly discussed. If approved, action to inaugurate the order should be taken at the coming convention.

2. We have quite a goodly number of young men and women, both in Oregon and Washington, who possess the zeal and natural ability for the work of lecturers and superintendents of Secular Sunday-schools but are deficient in some branch of education. We need a college or university where such young persons can devote their entire time to attaining proficiency in those branches in which they are lacking. Under our present successful system of Secular churches and Sunday-schools, with regular pastors and superintendents, a knowledge of music is indispensable. We have the needed grounds allotted, and a deed will be given as soon as the enterprise is an assured success. Plans and methods of securing subscriptions to stock should be discussed.

3. The completion of the buildings at our Secular Park at New Era should be provided for, so that next summer we may hold a three weeks' Secular camp-meeting.

4. Type-setting machines and hard times have reduced the price of type and presses. We greatly need an outfit for printing our lesson leaves and instructions to teachers.

5. It would be advisable to adopt some form of will, codicil, or authorization that could not be contested or ignored, by virtue of which, in case of death of a member of the Union, our lecturers could have exclusive charge of funeral services when surviving relatives happen to be in a state of servility to priestcraft.

6. It has been suggested that an amendment be made to our constitution—of which amendment this is due notice—that in future our conventions shall consist of regularly elected delegates from established churches, Sunday-schools, and societies.

7. By no means the least important subject for consideration is how to get avowed Liberals to be true to the cause they profess to love and induce them to support our Liberal periodicals. When a professed Liberal fails to take and pay in advance for a Liberal paper or magazine, how is he any more consistent than the church member who professes devotion to the church, yet never contributes one cent to its support? The wisdom of the convention cannot be better employed than in devising means to increase the circulation of our papers, and giving practical evidence of appreciation of the great and good work done by those faithful and fearless champions, our editors and publishers.

The work of salvation is well under way in our state—salvation from ignorance, from superstition, from priestly tyranny, from fear of death, and from servile obedience to Mrs. Grundy; but no one deserves liberty who does not contribute his share to the emancipation of mankind—who silently enjoys the air of freedom, while thousands sicken in the pestilential atmosphere of superstition. The persecuting spirit is abroad, and effective work must be done if the car of human progress is to continue onward to the goal of civil and religious liberty. Against us are arrayed all monopolists, all who enjoy ill-gotten gains, all the priests, all the ministers and other drones of society, and all the hypocrites. We are making encouraging headway in the West, but it has been mainly by the self-sacrifice of a few; the many have done little or nothing. But we are on the right track. Our Sunday-school work is enlisting the hearty help of the mothers, and with the women on our side eventual triumph is certain. We will succeed, not by persecution and ostracism, but by education, by justice, by love, by convincing people, old and young, that the only way to secure their own happiness is by promoting the happiness of others. Our convention is called not for mere amusement or encouragement of sociability—although we highly prize these—but for practical work; to earnestly study and to adopt plans for more effective service. We need the counsel, the encouragement, and the presence of the good, the true, the zealous, the workers. The Oregon State Secular Union appeals to such to attend the convention. Give the subjects herein named your most serious attention; come prepared to state—briefly as possible—the result of your thought. Decide at once to attend, then make everything bend to the accomplishment of that purpose.

Last Chance to Obtain a Rare Book.

David Friedrich Strauss's "Life of Jesus Critically Examined" was first published in two volumes for $9. The edition ran out, and another was issued in one volume for $4.50. This edition is almost exhausted, less than fifty copies being in existence. Of what are left we have obtained a share, and can furnish them postpaid at the last price, $4.50. They will not last long, and we advise those of our friends who want a copy to send at once. When these are gone there will be no more to be had. This edition is translated from the fourth German edition by George Eliot, and contains 784 large octavo pages of solid reading, very clearly printed. It is unnecessary to say to students that this is a very valuable work, one which the church wishes had never been written, but which it cannot controvert.

Observations.

A voyager around Cape Horn brings this greeting from one whom I have never seen. I understand that the writer is connected with the British consulate at Coronel, Chili, S. A. The message is addressed to "G. McDonald, Esqr.," and reads thus:

A Schoolmate of the fearless "Saladin" (W. S. Ross) sends
A warm remembrance to the brave leaders of my faith, Ingersoll, Putnam, and the McDonalds, and to whom I add the feeble spark of my Scottish enthusiasm from this faraway land of Chili at the mention of their glorious names. Yours in the cause.

WILLIAM TAYLOR.

That is graceful and kind. Looking toward you, Brother Taylor, I pass it along.

As long as governments maintain the custom of putting offenders against their laws to death, private murder cannot reasonably be expected to become obsolete. Such a custom keeps alive the notion that violent and premature death can repair an injury, and while it continues to be practiced officially, individuals influenced by so luminous an example will occasionally usurp the corporate function and kill on their own account. This will be true more especially in cases of lynching and the avenging of private wrong—murders incident to brawls and robberies belong to another class. Abolition of the death penalty ought to be a great civilizer, and I am in favor of it, not from any care for homicides, but for the sake of the example. As to the deliberate murderer, having committed the greatest possible invasion, he has forfeited every possible consideration previously due him from mankind. The final disposition of his body is to be determined, not by what is best for him, but by what will have the most salutary effect on others inclined his way. So much is prefatory.

People living in New York state and its vicinity are asked to sign a petition for the pardon of a girl named Maria Barberi, who killed her lover, one Cataldo, and has for that offense been sentenced to die in the electric chair. But one side of the story has been heard, which is of necessity the Barberi's side, for the reason that Cataldo was too dead to testify at either the inquest or the trial. She avers that Cataldo betrayed her and continued to betray her for a period covering nearly a year, and that because he refused to make the process continuous throughout the natural life of one or both she slew him, after the manner of her countrywomen, the Italians. The other side of the story, as divulged by the prosecution, is that Cataldo had saved a considerable sum of money earned at his trade of boot-shining, and that the Barberi, desirous of sharing the same, voluntarily entered into meretricious relations with the deceased. Cataldo deferred the division of wealth until her patience was worn out; and then the wronged and disappointed one cut his throat with a razor and repaired to the bank for the money, which was refused her. Her arrest and conviction followed. No offspring blessed her union with Cataldo. The petitioners for her pardon represent that she acted as every woman should whose virtue is gone and who has no money or marriage certificate to put in evidence as to the fact. Mrs. Susan B. Anthony, one of the signers, contends that since the Barberi is a woman, and women have no right to legislate or sit on a jury, the female is not amenable to the law. Mrs. Mary A. Livermore says that if the girl had been her daughter she would have killed Cataldo herself. There is no answering these arguments. If the leaders of the woman suffrage movement insist on inaugurating the vendetta, nothing but force can have the effect to dissuade them. But as one crying for mercy I would plead that though women do not make the laws, they are protected by them as well as men are if not better, and that even though the law should discriminate against women that would be a poor excuse for withdrawing its protection from men; that Cataldo is just as dead as though a male person had effected his decease, and that as the victim was a man it was wholly appropriate that a jury of men should condemn his murderer. It is not supposable that women can understand how it affects a man's feelings to be killed. Had Cataldo taken the girl's life, it might have been a graceful thing to let the ladies pronounce his doom.

The question of virgin honor has been made an unduly conspicuous term in the present problem, as it is in all others where there is the slightest opening for its introduction. Whatever the Barberi may have conceived her honor to be, it was certainly in her own keeping and was not ravished from her by force. I have often wondered why some women and men who become homicidal or litigious over the loss of their honor did not take the precaution to get it insured at full value.

But another case has arisen here in New York which deserves to be considered along with the foregoing. It is briefly stated. Kate Weil lived for a year with Filippo Giampapa, and a boy was born. The father thought so much of his son that the mother deserted both and returned to her parents. Filippo followed and solicited her with much earnestness to marry him and legitimize the young one. She refused and he stabbed her. It is the Cataldo-Barberi case reversed, with a child in the balance on the man's side. I should be interested to know how believers in the equality of the sexes before the law can make a hero of Barberi and a criminal of Giampapa. The truth is that both are murderous brutes, male and female, the product of Roman Catholicism and the political institutions of Italy. They are built as Mr. Tennyson might say. The case is in a sense a sanitary one, with about as little room for sentiment as is found in other questions of that class. If I were a governor I should not be sure how I ought to deal with the accused, and I doubt that the petitioners know what they are about. A hint that pleading the baby act will not promote female equality might be sufficient to the wise.

All is not well with the Rev. Dr. Funk's aggregation of political reformers at Prohibition Park. Last week Senator Ben Tillman, of South Carolina, was on exhibition at the park, where he engaged in a debate with Professor Dickie and ex-Governor St. John, of Kansas, on Prohibition vs the Dispensary. A jury of twenty-five reformers, among them the Rev. Mr. Boole, Methodist and Prohibitionist, was empaneled to hear the evidence and render a verdict according to the merits of the discussers. On the first day the Rev. Mr. Boole developed so marked an inclination to argue with Tillman, and to debate the question instead of adjudicating upon it, that Manager Haskell, in order to give the speakers a chance to be heard, was obliged to announce that on the second day no interruption by the jury would be tolerated. This graveled the Rev. Mr. Boole; besides, the other jurymen were obstinate, and voted for the dispensary instead of for prohibition, and so the next time he met Haskell there was a row. The manager charged him with disorderly conduct, and he called the manager a liar, whereupon Haskell swatted him on the brow with a bundle of religious periodicals. The reverend gentleman is a scrapper himself and an expert boxer, but before he could apply his science on Haskell the bystanders intervened, and the mill was deferred. Boole swore to God he would have Haskell "put over the road," and Haskell warned Boole to keep away from Prohibition Park under pain of arrest. It is now understood that Dr. Funk, editor of the Voice, will move to amend the Basis of Union by including the rules of procedure formulated by the Marquis of Queensbury and exemplified by Lord John Sullivan, late of the American prize ring.

No, Mr. H. G., of Skull Valley, Yavapai county, Arizona, I am not debating Spiritualism with Mr. A. D. Swan. We have some manifestations here in New York just now that make his $2 spiritual phenomena look pretty sick. In a Roman Catholic church uptown there is a relic of a departed saint named Anne, whose full name is unknown to the deponent, consisting of a wrist-bone, which has been miraculously preserved. Miraculous preserves are common in the Catholic household. The bone has healing proclivities and effects cures in the most mysterious manner. Cripples are uncrippled every day, and they have thrown so many canes and crutches on the altar of the church that the sexton does not expect to buy any wood this fall. He has them to burn. One man who wore a cork sole four inches thick had his leg pulled at this miracle joint, and now he walks without a limp. Anyone doubting the cure may see the discarded cork-soled shoe and be convinced. Another man who had been speechless for years rubbed the relic across his thorax and then went home and swore at his wife, who was so overcome with joy that she struck him with the stove-handle. It is hinted that this patient had just completed a term in the penitentiary, where speech is discouraged, but the hospital records show that the doctors took five stitches in his scalp, so the fact of his wife's hitting him is as good as proved. Several other persons, male and female, testify how well they are since they touched the relic. They do look hearty, and if there were any evidence that they had ever been otherwise the managers of the relic would have a fortune at their command. With these things occurring so near by, how can I deny anything that Mr. Swan affirms as taking place in Cook county, Ill.? And how can he doubt the efficacy of St. Anne's wrist-bone, or anything else?

The remarks by Editor Brann of the Waco Iconoclast on the subject of the new baby at Baylor Baptist University are crude in the extreme. He is probably correct, historically, in saying that Antonia Teixeira, a young girl, was brought from Brazil to Texas to be educated in the university and returned to her people as a missionary for their conversion and baptism. His statement that the girl has unexpectedly assumed the responsibility of motherhood may also be accepted, and his version of President Burleson's explanation involving a negro servant may be verbally accurate. But Editor Brann's assertion that the child has the "blue eye and wooden face" of the college faculty, and his implication that the Rev. Dr. Burleson knows more about it than he has revealed, don't go at all in this scientific age. A man good enough to be the president of a Baptist theological seminary would necessarily impress his personality upon all who shared the light of his countenance, and Editor Brann cannot be so unfamiliar with the laws of heredity and prenatal influence as not to have heard how much environment has to do with matters of this kind.

The courage of the amateur theologians who control our police department is distinguished as moral rather than physical. That is to say, in the face of public sentiment and in defiance of the Constitution, they have the fearlessness to arrest all ice-men, provision dealers, and vendors of collar-buttons who do business on Sunday. They also have the intrepidity to apprehend females found on the streets at night, and even to enter the domicils of such and drag them forth. This is moral courage. But the same puissant officials who with unblanched cheek achieve these deeds of valor, have surrendered ignominiously to the element distinguished as lawless in a mere physical sense. It has been customary for many seasons for societies of organized citizens, on returning from excursions by water, to march in a body from the wharf to such trains as would take them to their homes. These marchers have often been annoyed by gangs of "toughs" creating a disturbance in their ranks for purposes of robbery. The law provides that "it shall be the duty of the police authorities to furnish such escort as may be necessary to maintain the public peace and order," and under previous corrupt administrations this has been done, as ought to be done though it involved calling out the militia. Our constabulary, however, have ignored the precedent and simplified matters—at the same time shirking responsibility—by forbidding the parades. If the toughs, thus denied the processionist as meat for plunder, should, as a last resort, turn upon the isolated pedestrian, there is no doubt in my mind that the commissioners, by another exercise of moral courage, would prohibit residents of New York from frequenting streets reserved to the lawless gangs. From officials who have so little respect for human rights as to revive and rehabilitate a dead and popularly damned institution like the Sunday law, this refusal to guard citizens in their persons and property is what we might most naturally expect.

In the letter which in Sunday-school literature passes as one that Benjamin Franklin wrote to Thomas Paine to dissuade him from publishing the "Age of Reason," this sentence occurs:

For among us it is not necessary, as among the Hottentots, that a youth, to be raised into the company of men, should prove his manhood by beating his mother.

If Franklin is the author of this he wrote it when America had just officially rejected the established religion of its parent, England, and had raised itself into the company of the nations of the earth by administering to its mother a historical thumping in that encounter now referred to as the Revolutionary War. Franklin's illustration, therefore, would have had more force if he had thought of it before Paine published the "Crisis" and "Common Sense." As applied, it is wholly asinine and infelicitous, and is open to the criticism of being inappropriate as coming from a patriotic American.

GEO. E. MACDONALD.

They [the enforcers of law "because it is law"] do not seem to know that every battle for freedom began in an opposition to tyrannical laws. They have not heard that the Stamp act also was a law, and that a good many Americans, of whom George Washington was the head devil, gained some distinction by outrageously assuming an attitude of hostility to the enforcement of that law. But that was the case as to one law, and—there are others. —New York Morning Journal.

AVON, July 22, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose $10 to you to help the Wise case along, trusting you will see that it is used to the best advantage to help defray the expense of the suit.

Yours truly, THOMAS TRIPP.

It Is That to Thousands.

SARATOGA, WYO., July 15, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: As our subscription has just expired, we send $5 for renewal for two years. We have taken it for so long that it seems a household necessity.

Respectfully, JONES & WILLIAMS.

He Wishes and He Does.

LEE, N. DAK., July 23, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I believe I am in arrears. Sorry for it. Will try to do better after this. Please find inclosed $5 for your TRUTH SEEKER, which I would not be without for twice the price, and Paine's "Great Works Complete."

For the Wise Cause.

SAN MARCIAL, N. M., July 27, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I herein inclose the sum of $5, which comes to you from San Marcial's liberty-loving Freethinkers, for the J. B. Wise fund. Certainly that fund ought not to go a-begging.

Yours, etc., W. J. RIBLEY.

To Keep the Light Going.

SYBENE, O., July 30, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Please find herewith $1. Move date on tab, so when I see the oil running low, I can get a move on me.

Pardon me for being tardy, but charge it up to the banks for locking up the money. Yours for U. M. L. all round this planet.

"Travels in Faith" is Excellent.

REDMON, ILL., July 23, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $6-$1 for the defense of Wise, the remainder for two years' subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER.

I will add another dollar for eight copies of Paine's "Age of Reason." I want them for gratuitous distribution. If "Travels in Faith," by Captain Adams, could be put out in the same way it would be excellent as a missionary document.

Respectfully, MARK ROWE.

PITTSBURG, PA., July 29, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Please send me THE TRUTH SEEKER for one year and the "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book," and one each of the pamphlets named.

Inclosed find $3.32. G. H. BOWDEX.

P.S.—Since writing my order a friend has concluded to send also. So please send THE TRUTH SEEKER for one year and the "Pictorial Text-Book" per announcement to address.

A Suggestion.

JERSEY CITY, N. J., July 28, E.M. 295.

MR. EDITOR: I wish to say to THE TRUTH SEEKER readers that I want to do what little I can to help my fellow man. A new idea of mine is this: Why cannot every subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER send in with his subscription twenty-five cents extra every year—"no objections to more"—for the benefit of our much-beloved Brother Watson Heston, as we all know he is not overpaid, and he richly deserves it. Individually it is not much; collectively, it will do Brother Heston untold good. Let us all "lend a hand."

Yours without gods or spooks,

WM. THORPE.

A Reminder to Delinquents.

HACKLEMAN, IND., July 17, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $1.10-$1 to be applied on my subscription to the grand old TRUTH SEEKER and the remaining ten cents for "Thumbscrew and Rack."

I have been rather slow in remitting, but I could not forget it; THE TRUTH SEEKER would call to mind the deficiency each week when it would come into my house and there in my presence give superstition a hard slap in the face. A. R. BUMPAS.

Some Are Not So Liberal.

TRUXTON, N. Y., July 21, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I once more renew my subscription for THE TRUTH SEEKER. Would send for some books, also help the needy, had I the means to do so, but am old and poor. Nevertheless I am a Freethinker, and as liberal as I am able. I am outspoken and don't take a back seat for any of the church-goers.

With best wishes for you and the Truth Seeker Company, I am as ever yours for liberty and justice, JOHN DEAN.

Virginia No Better than New York.

RICHMOND, VA., July 28, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I hand you twenty-five cents, for which please send a copy of the "Age of Reason." The new chief of police here undoubtedly is thoroughly imbued with Christianity, as he is having street cars, shoe shining, and newspaper printing, etc., stopped on the Sabbath. The courts are being filled with trial cases in order to test the law. The street cars have not stopped yet, but they have been reported and will await the action of the court. We are getting as pious on Sunday New York.

D. J. PAXTON.

In Wonderful New Jersey.

OCEAN GROVE, N. J., July 23, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I have not received my TRUTH SEEKER since the issue dated June 29th. I have been to the postoffice every week, and get the same reply, "Nothing for you." In this town you cannot ride a wheel on Sunday, but you may walk along side of it to the gate, then you may ride to hell, if you like. You can get the Sunday papers from a few licensed newsboys at whatever price they choose to ask, but outside the gate you can get them at city prices. Ditto most everything else. The wagons, known as "Beer Arks," will supply you with a dozen bottles on the sly, but there is not a licensed saloon in the whole borough. Yea, verily, it is a sanctified place, and, to the best of my knowledge, I am the only infidel here.

Respectfully yours, JOHN M. SIMMS.

A Very Rash Christian.

DALLAS, TEX., July 23, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I am an enthusiastic reader of the old TRUTH SEEKER, and think that the cartoons are splendid. Several of your papers are sold in this city every week. Dallas is a city of about 50,000 people, and we have a lively, wide-awake Freethought Society here. Our standing challenge to the clergy gives them the chills, but none of them has so far mustered enough courage to meet us. We have been organized a year, and now have about 100 members. We meet every Sunday at 8 P.M., in Liberty Hall, 228 South Ervay street. We have had lectures from J. D. Shaw, J. E. Remsburg, and others. We also have some good local talent. Mrs. Sweeney, of the Women's Christian Temperance Union, attended one of our meetings, and wanted the name of the lecturer, saying that she would pray for him if he would acknowledge when God touched his heart. The secretary asked her if she would accept his name, too, and test her God by a time-limit of three months, and then, if they were not "touched," she should deny the existence of God and the power of prayer. She assented, but as yet neither of the "Infidels" is affected, though one of the secretary's dogs has been sick.

We are doing a good work here, and are Liberalizing the state to some considerable extent. If you will send me some sample copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER, I will distribute them. With best wishes for the cause and its advocates, the Liberal papers, I remain most sincerely,

G. S. LINCOLN, M.D.

President Freethinkers' Association of Dallas.

Born Into Intellectual Liberty.

ISHPEMING, MICH., July 21, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Copy of 13th inst. failed to reach me. Please send it. I, like many others, do not wish to miss even one copy, as "I love the truth," and do my share to help the good work along here and make TRUTH SEEKERS go around as far as possible. I am rather a new subscriber to your paper but old in infidelity, which I am proud to say, and never had the struggle to free myself from the fetters of theology, as my father was a Liberal in Europe ere my birth, but I realize keenly the effort necessary to overthrow the false teaching instilled from infancy with which unfortunately so many are burdened. We have many Liberals here of course in the ranks of our best men and women, mostly business and professional men. We have no Liberal organization here, which I regret, but have a business men's club, where many of the non-church goers congregate Sunday during church hours. I have read your TRUTH SEEKER more or less since its foundation, and always appreciated your great efforts in behalf of liberty and equality. I expect to hereafter be permanent on your books, and do all possible to secure more subscribers. I have not come across anything in your paper from this iron country, but we have many competent writers among the Liberals, who might and should make themselves useful.

Respectfully, ED. GIRZL.

Human Love "the Tie That Binds."

ST. JACOB, ILL., July 30, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Received paper, together with "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book." I am well pleased. Would like to say to the enthusiastic brother who wishes a trial (mock trial, I suppose) on the merit of the gospel story, to involve himself in an argument with some blood-of-Jesus minister and report results. I should be as eager to read the controversy as he could be the report of the "trial."

What is most necessary is for all Freethinkers to work in unison as much as can be done; aid one another, and lastly: to become thoroughly conversant with the Bible. I venture to say, if even the most devout Protestant or Catholic sincerely investigated this matter impartially, the colonel's prophecy "that the churches become schoolhouses and the cathedrals universities," would be fulfilled, the ministers and priests becoming teachers of science, ethics, and philosophy.

Love is the strongest natural tie that can bind human life. Unbarred, non-interfered with, left to its own distinct reason, it creates the most sublime felicity of the human soul (life), as recently shown in St. Louis, Mo., in the marriage of a niece of Archbishop Ryan to a very worthy young gentleman of Protestant persuasion. All was done on the part of their respective parents to prevent it, but love conquered; coming out of the gulch of superstition victorious, they landed in the glorious realm of liberty, showing the progress of the spirit of Thomas Paine and hosts of others. May the blessings of peace, happiness, prosperity, and long life be their reward.

Yours in fraternal spirit,

DR. F. F. BERGER.

Out and About During Vacation.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., July 22, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed is $1 toward defending Brother Wise. I trust he will come out victorious, and that Liberals will respond to the best of their ability in this very urgent case. It is true that times are very much out of joint yet, and our friends, as a rule, are not abundantly blessed with that which helps to make life happy; still, many can help one much more easily than one can help many, and I hope the appeal in THE TRUTH SEEKER for funds will be responded to by thousands. It may be a pleasure for THE TRUTH SEEKER family to read a little of my experience these last two Sundays; I know it will be for some of them, at least, as, when they read it, they will keep it as a memento and for future reference.

Our Sunday afternoon meetings being closed for the months of July and August has given me an opportunity to go out and visit our folks through the day. So, accordingly, I went to Bridesburg with my youngest daughter, Georgie, the first Sunday, to Mr. and Mrs. Ernst Platz's, who are well known to THE TRUTH SEEKER. It is needless to say that we had a glorious time. Grover Cleveland could not have been treated better had he been there. While there we were introduced to Mr. and Mrs. Moltz, with their family, who are also, I am pleased to state, admirers of THE TRUTH SEEKER. While there they expressed a desire that I should name their seven-weeks-old baby into the Secular ranks, but not having my Manual of Ceremonies with me, I promised to name the baby the next Sunday, if I came up, as I expected to do if my wife was able to accompany me. Sunday came, and my wife not being able to go, my second youngest daughter, Eleanor, went with me. We enjoyed another good time, and although the mercury was above the nineties, it did not prevent the mother from bringing her baby to have the ceremony of naming performed. His name is Ernst Ingersoll Moltz. We hope and trust that he will grow up and be as useful in our cause as is the intellectual giant after whom he is named. We hope other Liberals will follow this example by naming their offspring after the benefactors of the race. I will now close, with the hope that peace, plenty, prosperity, and health may reign supreme throughout the entire Freethought family.

GEO. LONGFORD.

GUELPH, ONT., July 23, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $1.75 for seven TRUTH SEEKER ANNUALS of different years. They are excellent. There is one thing wrong—in all the accuracy in them and in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and in the "Letters of Friends," many of which contain good points, there is the inaccuracy of calling papists Catholics. I know that many politicians pander to popery on account of the vote, but Rationalists must be accurate, especially as they are supposed to be natural and scientific. If there were a devil and he insisted upon calling himself an angel and desired everyone to do likewise, how would that be? A papist is a papist, and isn't anything else; and a Protestant is a Protestant, perhaps not quite so ignorant, superstitious, or intolerant as a general thing, but nearly so. All sects and creeds are intolerant whenever the power is with them. As the word Katholikos doesn't appear in any place in the entire text of the New Testament, though it does at the head of three or four epistles, to intimate that they are general and not addressed to any particular church, it cannot be an appropriate name either for any Christian or any Christian sect or church. Besides, the word is an adjective, wherever found in classics, and the English word "general" is the best translation of it. How can an adjective be the name of a sect? Or how can a sect be called an adjective? The pope derives his name either from the Greek pappas, or the Latin papa, father, and the papacy comes from the same. Then there are papal ablegates, papal delegates, papal this and papal that, including papal dispensations, etc. Popery is the only proper name for the religion of dupes of the pope. Neither is the "Church of Rome" a correct name for popery, as Rome was in existence many hundreds of years before there was any person called a pope; and popery adopted the word Roman on account of the prestige of the empire. Are papists ashamed that they were born and brought up papists? It looks like that. I would think that a proof-reader would change the word "Catholicism," "Romanism," etc., into "popery" whenever he would see it in copy. Neither is the word Catholic, or general, applicable either to popery or Christianity, as there are hundreds of millions in India, China, and other parts of the earth, who never heard of the pope or popery, or Christianity. I will not be sorry if I never see the "Church of Rome," "Catholicism," or "Romanism," where the word popery should be, in THE TRUTH

SEEKER again. I hope to write you more substantially before long. ACCURACY.

[With the word Catholic as with the word Infidel, it is not primarily a question of derivation but of usage. An Infidel is generally understood to be one who does not accept Christianity, although the word in Latin means "unfaithful," and was applied as an offensive epithet. It was in that sense an adjective, but everybody now uses it as a noun. The doubter is no longer, with us, "an infidel [unfaithful] dog," but an Infidel. From expressing a quality, the word has come to designate a man who holds certain views. So of Catholics: To the average intelligence, its use does not suggest "general," but calls to mind a church, which, in broad outlines, is the antithesis of the Protestant church. Or it means an adherent of this church, that is, a man who, as a Christian, is not a Protestant. We prefer to use the term which all understand and which is not offensive in the eyes of those it describes. A church has a right to choose its own name, as a political party has, and there is no occasion to use nicknames, even though those nicknames may be derived with perfect correctness etymologically. For these reasons we always speak of the Disciple church by that name, which it calls itself by, instead of using the nickname "Campbellite," bestowed by its opponents and derived from the name of its founder.—Ed. T. S.]

The "First Cause" Delusion.
NATIONAL MILITARY HOME, CAL.,
July 26, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I ask the question most seriously, Why is it that all religions adhere so tenaciously to a belief in a God, when everything in the universe seems to say there is no God?

They believe in and talk about a being that they have no adequate conception of, and which has been disproven thousands of times by the most exhaustive arguments that ever were made on any subject. They assume a hypothetical, false premise of a first cause, when absolutely there can be no such thing. Let them reason ever so correctly from such a premise, and they will invariably come to false and absurd conclusions. This imaginary God they make little else than a tyrannical autocrat of the universe. Yet they attach love, mercy, and goodness as attributes to his others of omnipotence, omniscience, and omnipresence, and all this in the face of actual facts of both natural and moral evils which we experience every day of our lives.

They even go so far as to say evil is good in embryo, and that wickedness is the means of producing righteousness. Well, perhaps were it not for wrong, we would not know what right is, or, for lack of darkness, appreciate light. Almost everything has its antithesis, and goes by contrast and comparison and relativity. But God has no relativity, unless it is the devil. This kind of runs the matter, instead of into the ground (or grave), beyond the horizon of our knowledge, into the vast unknown. Still, rather than give up their God and heaven, they must have a devil and hell, and a God the author of everything, I suppose, himself included. Who can not see the egregious absurdity of such a being?

Now, this God question should be settled first. It is the root of the upas-tree, and a tree is known by its fruits. All other questions, in a religious point of view, are side issues, and settling them merely lops off a few of its branches, and from the trunk will sprout out new branches, and shade all else about. Of course, it is by deduction from a priori reasoning. But the root must be dug up and destroyed, or we shall be decoyed and destroyed.

Obsta principiis should be our shibboleth as radicals. Cutting off the branches, by induction from effect to cause, may do temporarily, but will not remove the cause. Science is doing its work bravely, but it has to work often in the shade of the poisonous tree.

The number three seems to have a magic power with the superstitious: The tri-headed vampire of a deity on which all monopolies are built, and the church the sum of all villainies. Then the tri-headed government vampire, subservient to the triple-godhead. The three professions, a course to mankind. And I might add father, mother, and oldest son, who takes precedence of the rest of the family on the authority of the Bible and laws derived therefrom. So I might run the mysterious number into nature with her sun, moon, and earth—the three seasons—the three periods of life—the first, middle, and last, all of which are based more or less on superstition. Of course Deism is not so absurd, but it must go before the sweeping power of truth and science.

What are we to do? Labor and wait for ever? One would think electricity alone, even when it flows so copiously from the points of pens, would demolish the tri-headed monster. But alas! no, not yet. Truth moves slowly, even with the lightning of reason, and wait we must. Great heavens, what I have suffered from this one first cause alone! But what cannot be cured at once must be endured. Left an orphan, homeless, friendless, penniless, without education and now without a God, as I have all-sufficient reason to believe there is not such a being, and it is an insult to a long life of experience of the most disastrous kind to palm off on an innocent, harmless man. CHRIST MAS.

An Appeal.

LEEDHIANA, PUNJAB, INDIA,
June 28, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I, like many others here, have for a long time been considering that the religion of Freethought—the practical religion of reason and humanity, virtue and good works—was the highest phase of religion which man, in his evolution and stages of religious transition, was bound to follow in the long run, if he was true to himself. I have always considered, for my part, that the term "Infidel," as applied to honest skeptics and ignorers of formalities and superstitions, is an equivocation, inasmuch as, by the law of gradation and degree, each and every individual in this world is an Infidel, in a greater or less degree, to one or another of the faiths in existence, whereas the Freethinker is far less an Infidel in its vulgar sense, since he culls out the good eclectically and practices it, leaving all dogmas to take themselves off. Either religion (if true) teaches you to be good and do good, or to be hypocrites, preaching one thing and practicing another. In all religions there is a prominent theory of good, but a practical admixture of evil. Freethought is, then, the reforming agency in this Babel of grotesque religious views. When we see a Christian good, virtuous, etc., we call him truly religious, but when we look around we see equally good Mohammedans, Jews, Hindoos, Buddhists, etc. Either all religions, then, are modifications of the same fundamental truth, or men are better than their faith requires of them, in which case they cease to be religionists and become sensible moralists. If we look carefully into all religions, as exhibited in their codes, we are inclined to believe that men make a good religion, such as Freethought, and not that religion makes a man good, for all religions permit, if they do not enjoin, evil. As for the future life, if there could be one after this body is decomposed, I think the agency by which it is rebuilt can take care of it and us. Let us concern ourselves with this life and certainty, and not with speculations. We know naught of death, as none of us has died before and returned, and nature contradicts the possibility of reappearance of the same dead plant or animal just as much as it denies annihilation or creation. Of a personal God (ourselves), a rational Pantheism, no true Freethinker speaks ill. We are defensive agencies of the church and the parsons, who act on the aggressive, and something in human nature forces us to be aggressive also.

I was born a Protestant Christian, of mixed European and Asiatic descent, imbibing the theology and philosophies of both, and in each transitional conversion gaining experience. I embraced Unitarianism, progressed to Mohammedanism, and this has brought me to Atheism, so far as a personal religious God and prophets are concerned, unless we include as minor prophets Buddha, Sankaracharya, etc., and seers Edison, Ingersoll, Bradlaugh, Voltaire, Paine, etc.

I am very desirous of learning more from Freethought literature, but such is not to be obtained here, and radical politics is as deficient in India as rational religion. I have collected around me a band of Inquirers, but at present we are too poor to buy any of your works in such necessarily large and varied number as to constitute a circulating library, if not for distribution. Had any of us the means in this poor country (where we Eurasians are downtrodden) to individually or collectively purchase a sample copy of each of the cheap tracts published for sale in your issue May 18, 1895, no doubt our band would increase, hence our funds, and we could affiliate with you all, paying for the benefits derived.

The above tracts will cost only about $5, and I write to ask you and other generous Liberal and Freethinker readers of your valuable journal to be so good as to, either individually or by subscription, send us the above books (one of each), and any others of Bradlaugh, Ingersoll, Paine, Shaw, Voltaire, Renan, Remsburg, Burr, and other works of the Truth Seeker Company's publication. In course of time we may pay off the debt, if we are trusted by you. India is slowly getting enlightened, though crowded with missionaries, and there is no doubt that the first great good that would accrue by the reading of such Freethought literature is moral courage, independent reasoning, and the exposure of fallacies, even of the enlightened Christian faith. Once missionary efforts are neutralized, it would be easy to sow the seeds, which are sure to bring fruit.

The following kinds of books are most required here:

- (1) "The God Idea and Its Fallacy."
- (2) "The Origin of Religions."
- (3) "Bible Contradictions."
- (4) "Christian Tolerance and Virtue!"
- (5) "Essays on Humanity, Virtue," etc.

In Madras and Bombay originally there were published Freethought journals, but these are now defunct for want of enterprise, tact, perseverance, confidence, or philanthropy of projectors.

If we, who intend to call ourselves the "Indian Freethought Reform League," under the guidance of Pundit Gorardan Dass, Jailer, Leedhiana (most of us graduates) are only provided with some literature, back numbers of Freethought journals, and a small hand-press (Victor or Baltimorean), self-inking, we shall pursue the propaganda enthusiastically and gratuitously, subscribing among ourselves for the cost of stationery, and distributing the labor among ourselves.

Hoping to hear from you, and trusting you will publish this, I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

H. U. R. SNOW,

Sec. Indian Freethought Reform League.

Freethinkers the Preservers of Peace.

SKULL VALLEY, ARIZ., July 10, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose some lines entitled "Death!" written in 1870 shortly after leaving a Catholic college. They were the result of my conviction (although a Protestant) that the Catholics had the safest ladder upon which to climb to heaven. The lines will testify that I am not using the ladder. The vigorous dispute concerning Spiritualism vs. Materialism between Geo. E. Macdonald and A. D. Swan, made me look them up and rewrite them, as you see. The wonder to me, now, is how I, at twenty, could face the ordeal of giving up heaven, when, in a few years after, I again became a "Christian"—now called "Disciple"—being over-persuaded that the fault, by their theory, was in the interpretation of scripture, and that the scripture was, indeed, good for "doctrine, reproof, and in instructions for all righteousness." Yet, in less than a year, I was tired of it, the weariness caused first by a good brother writing in Brother Libscomb's paper that "The unpardonable sin—the only sin that will not be forgiven—the sin against the Holy Ghost—was the calling of Christians or Disciples 'Campbellites!'" "Great God!" said I. It was my first breaking of the Third commandment for eight months—"what can't be proved?" But I was safe—not so. I, too, had often alluded to the "Campbellites." Next I was asked by some Adventists (Sunday Adventists) to read the Apocalypse. That pretty nearly finished me. After that I met a Sabbatarian Adventist who proved conclusively that I had not remembered the Sabbath nor kept it holy. Then I knew why the Catholic church did not allow the laity to read the Bible; they are better dupes and Christians without it. I said to myself, "I wish I was out of it." Shortly after the good Lord helped me. I had a lame foot and could not wear a boot on it; some horses tied behind a wagon broke loose, and refused to let me catch them. I sat down, took a regular old-fashioned swear at them, and Christ was gone! A person sat on the wagon and cried lustily about my "lost religion," but I said I was glad I was "rid of the damned mixed up mess." I put grain in a feed box and the devil caused them (the horses, not the religious) to go up and eat. This proved to me that grain and the devil and a little headwork were almost as good as God and prayers on such occasions.

But I have a tender spot for all good Christians, Catholics and Protestants, priests and preachers alike; nine out of ten good ones do not believe the Bible [see Engstrom-Putnam debate], the only trouble is that they have no confidence in the inherent goodness of their fellowman. They say, in substance, "I am all right, but take the fear of hell away from people less intelligent than I, and they may burn my house, ravish my women, steal my property, and kill me whenever they conveniently can."

I now come to what I really meant to have mentioned at first, and that is A. D. Swan's remark that Materialists were as illiberal as are those "who would burn those of different views at the stake." History, recent and ancient, proves that such suspicions are the parents of the spirit of persecution and hate. That suspicion makes us want "to get in the first blow." The times are now when Protestant and Catholic glare at each other in a not very loving manner, and let a row once start, and Protestants will shout about Ireland in 1641, Bloody Mary and James II of England; while Catholics will have the same right to think evil because of Oliver Cromwell, William of Orange, and Henry the VIII. No, the mission of Freethought is to keep peace, to maintain justice, and keep the Goddess of Liberty on her throne (and keep our temper also). Let God into the Constitution, and the music will commence.

The trained cadets from Catholic institutions will be ready to assert their just claim to the "Prince of Peace" with shot, shell, and bayonet. The bands from Protestant institutions will return the favor with interest. If the matter were not serious Freethinkers could look on indifferently, but that will not be permitted. In the meantime it is our duty as Freethinkers, as Materialists and Spiritualists, as Theosophists, Adventists, Jews, and even Christians, to keep religion and law separate. We cannot afford to make laws about unprovable things. We have too many laws about things now that we can hear, feel, see, and taste. What will be our lot if those ideas that have not even a claim to enough substance on which to base a guess are recognized as facts? God and religion must remain separated from laws of all kinds.

I am a Prohibitionist, but the moment it seeks to cloak itself with religion it is no longer a secular policy, but becomes a principle of oppression, and it were better that people got drunk than to have them asked, "Do you believe in the God of the Constitution?" The way is open to a thousand vagaries in that case. Temples would have to be erected to him—grand, beautiful, costly, "as becomes a mighty nation." Days consecrated to his worship. "Jesus Christ, the sovereign Lord," might have to have a prime minister. People may not believe it now, and think it only a sensational statement made for effect, but a moment's reflection will show them plainly that he would not be placed in the Constitution if it were not deemed a benefit. No matter what the offices created might be called, their effect, expense, and greater evils would be the same.

Catholic and Protestant may well thank Freethinkers for trying to save them from their own folly, the least of which is, what they are getting ready for so diligently, cutting each other's throats. In the meantime, let all Spiritualists, Adventists, Jews, Materialists, and Liberal Christians be agreed on this one thing: No law or office unless there is an absolute material necessity for it.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Three Ships.

Three ships there be a-sailing
Betwixt the sea and sky;
And one is Now, and one is Then,
And one is By-and-By.

The first little ship is all for you—
Its masts are gold, its sails are blue,
And this is the cargo it brings:
Joyful days with sunlight glowing,
Nights where dreams like stars are growing.
Take them, sweet, or they'll be going!
For they every one have wings.

The second ship is all for me—
A-sailing on a misty sea
And out across the twilight gray.
What it brought of gift and blessing
Would not stay for my caressing—
Was too dear for my possessing—
So it sails and sails away.

The last ship, riding fair and high
Upon the sea, is By-and-By.
O wind, be kind, and gently blow!
Not too swiftly hasten hither.
When she turns, sweet, you'll go with her—Sailing, floating, hither, thither—
To what port I may not know.

—St. Nicholas.

Sayings of Children.

Selected.

A CITY BOY'S YEARNING.

wish I could move right away from this flat,
Where in five little rooms we are bound,
For I'd like to be out in the country once more,
To dig a big hole in the ground.

No one had thought to teach the minister's little girl a verse for Children's Sunday, as she was so small. She said she could say one, and her teacher lifted her up on the organ. Bonniwell folded her little hands demurely, and, with the most seraphic smile, said softly but distinctly, "My papa's fabrit vegetable is custard pie."

"Boys," said a teacher in a Sunday-school, "can any of you quote a verse from scripture to prove that it is wrong for a man to have two wives?" He paused, and after a moment or two a bright boy raised his hand. "Well, Thomas?" said the teacher, encouragingly. Thomas stood up and said, "No man can serve two masters." The question ended there.

Little Dick C—got into trouble with a school-fellow the other day, and agreed with him to 'hav it out' before school next morning. That evening when Dick knelt by his mother's side to say his prayers before going to bed, he delivered himself as follows, after the usual "Now I lay me": "And, O God, please make me strong as lions an' things, 'cause I got to lick a boy in the morning—Amen."

Ethel (aged four): "Did you know Adam named all the animals?" Frances (aged three): Did he name the elephant?" Ethel: "Of course he did." Frances (after a wondering pause): "How did he name the elephant?" Ethel (in a superior tone): "Why, I suppose he looked at the elephant, and he said, 'I think you look just like an elephant, and I guess I'll call you—elephant.' That's the way he did it."

Little Isabel's mother had very injudiciously allowed the child to drink weak tea with her meals instead of milk. One day Isabel was taken out to lunch at a friend's house, and the friend, never dreaming that a child could drink anything other than milk, placed it before her in a broad, low, fancy cup. The child gazed at the milk in silence for a while, and then astonished her hostess by remarking disdainfully, "I are no cat."

Sunday-school Superintendent: "I am glad to see quite a number of new faces with us to-day—bright, eager faces full of promise, full of interest in the Sunday-school, and rejoicing to be here. And now, before we close this little talk about the lesson and listen to the report of the secretary, I will wait a moment to see if there are any points that have been overlooked. Has anyone a question to ask?" Several of the New Boys: "Goin' to hav a Chris'mus tree this year?"

One of the neighbor's little boys was going to a fancy dress party last night in the guise of a mediæval lord of high degree. Of course he was all excitement beforehand. In the afternoon he came running in next door with the announcement: "Oh, Miss S—, you oughter see the things I'm goin' to wear to the party to-night! There's a doublet, an' hose, an' a big hat with a feather in, an' a gold chain, an' a cloak lined with vermin!" He probably meant ermin.

To-day I asked my mamma if I could whittle, Yes, I did
"Oh no, my girlie," said she, "you're too little," So she did.

But Tom stepped so hard right on my toe, I cried, I did.
She said: "Oh, you're too big a girl to cry out so."

That's what she did.
Why can't I cry if I am little,
Or, if I'm big, why can't I whittle?

"Ah, Aunt Annie, I am to be cremated to-morrow," exclaimed a small boy joyously on his arrival home from school one afternoon. "Now, does the child mean cremated or promoted?" said the aunt to a visitor who was present. "It is what Alice in Wonderland would call a port-manteau word," said her companion, "but it is not half so bad as something my little son said the other day. He announced to every one in the house that his baby sister was to be 'crucified' the next Sunday. Of course he meant 'christened'."

"A prophet is not without honor save in his own country," is one of the old sayings that are never out of date. "You have been very naughty, Nelly," said a writer of children's stories to her little daughter one day, "and I shall have to punish you." "What are you going to do to me, mamma?" inquired the tearful Nell. "Shall you put me to bed now, in the middle of the day?" "No," replied her mother. "Well, I don't think anything else would be so bad," said the child, with renewed cheerfulness, "unless—O mamma!" she wailed, as a sudden thought struck her, "I haven't got to sit still and hear you read one of the stories you've written, hav I?"

BETTER WORLD

A PHILOSOPHICAL ROMANCE

By Dr. E. B. SOUTHWICK.

For I dipt into the future, far as human eye could see, Saw the Vision of the world, and all the wonders that would be

So said the poet Tennyson, and although what he saw was more or less remarkable he was on the outside of the tent relatively to our present author. Dr. Southwick, without telling us how he got there, relates the many and strange adventures that befell him in a land without a sun or a newspaper, but where light and everlasting spring abide nevertheless; where women are the stronger sex, where all dress alike, wear no buttons, go in bathing together, and are "naked and not ashamed."

There is something of "Looking Backward" in this book, with a spice of Gulliver added, and it is totally devoid of religious superstition. It will be read with interest and curiosity.

Hard Knocks at Christianity.

By R. WHEELER.

This book is just what its title implies—thumping whacks at superstition. It deals with the effect of Christianity on the world, showing what Christians have done to advance their religion and impede the progress of man. It shows that Jesus was a false prophet, that the gospels are not authentic, and that Christianity is a borrowed system of religion. That the Bible is not in accord with Science, that the atonement scheme is futile and foolish, and that religion is not a real benefit to man.

By the census of 1890, the above is the value of

Church Property

in the United States.

Should It Be Exempt from Taxation?

REASONS WHY IT SHOULD NOT.

Our pamphlet with this title contains an Argument for Equality of Taxation, and a Statement of Facts, giving, from the Census of 1890, the Value, by Denominations, of Church Property in the United States and in the several States and Territories and in all Cities having 25,000 or more inhabitants; so arranged as to show at a glance the relative standing as to Wealth of the Leading Denominations and Denominations. Groups. Also, much other matter of special interest to certain Cities, States, and Sections, all comparisons being based upon official figures. This pamphlet is the only one of the kind published. In no other work are the facts, figures, and arguments to be found. The figures, being derived from the Government Census of 1890, will not be superseded until the census of 1900 shall have been completed—probably about eight years hence. The arguments are unanswerable and will have the dew of morning on them so long as the injustices of church exemption is suffered to exist.

400 Years OF Freethought

By Samuel Porter Putnam

Large Octavo, 1165 pp., Gilt Sides and Back, Marbled Edges. $5.

With The Truth Seeker for One Year, $6.50.

141 FULL-PAGE PORTRAITS!

Of the Most Eminent Freethinkers, of the Past Four Hundred Years.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY announced in October that this superb work was at last ready for delivery. It had been in preparation for so long that some of the subscribers were getting a little impatient and wondering when they would have the opportunity to see for themselves whether it possessed all the merits claimed for it by the publishers. They did not realize the magnitude of the work, and that the six months' delay in getting it out was due to the fact that they were to have fifty per cent more reading than they had been promised and nearly three times as many portraits. Such was the case, however. Instead of six hundred pages of letter-press there are nearly nine hundred, and the fifty portraits promised in the prospectus have multiplied to one hundred and forty-one! Considering the fact that the illustrations are the most costly part of the book—as undoubtedly to many they will also be the most attractive—and properly estimating the expense of the extra three hundred pages of text, it is evident that the subscriber received about one hundred per cent more for his $5 than was guaranteed to him. Well, the nearly eleven hundred copies of the volume subscribed for were sent out, and now we know what the recipients think of their investment. Judging by the letters that reach this office, they are not only satisfied—more than satisfied—but surprised and delighted that they got such a bargain.

As for the subject matter of FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT, it covers nearly every phase of progress and development and presents them in such orderly sequence as to give the best possible picture of human evolution. In Part First we have Freethought as a manifestation and influence; in Part Second, as an organized force. With this history are given sketches of the lives of the men and women who have taken part in the movement. It unites the past and the present. It is a world book and a home book. It fulfils the promise of its inception, and is the most magnificent work ever issued by the Freethought Press.

Price, $5. With "The Truth Seeker" One Year, $6.50.

WITH DAUGHTER'S BABE UPON HIS KNEES.

A new edition of that splendid prose poem "Life," by "the prince of orators," Col. R. G. Ingersoll. It is larger and better than the old edition, and can be framed or placed upon the table as an ornament. In the center of the card appear the portraits of the Colonel and the baby, surrounded by the prose poem, which has been truthfully described as, "one of the masterpieces of the orator and poet, who now, as far as we know, stands alone in the living world." It will make a delightful present, and will be a souvenir not only of intellectual greatness, but of artistic workmanship. It is printed on heavy board, gilt boveled edge. The size is 12x16 inches, and the price only 75 cents, post-paid.

NOAH got full once, but whatever else may be said against him, he knew enough to go in when it rained.—Investigator.

"KEEP your temper, laddie. Never quarrel wi' an angry person, 'specially a woman. Mind ye, a soft answer's aye best. It's commanded—and forbye, it makes them far madder than anything else ye could say."—Tid-Bits.

A CONNECTICUT clergyman wears the medal for unique and picturesque asininity. He thanked God that the frost destroyed the apple blossoms in his section, and prayed that they might be destroyed all over the world. What a hard-cider headache he must have had at one time!—Portland Argus.

Don't you find your religious work to your liking?" a Montana minister was asked. "Well," returned the divine, slowly, "I can't say that I do. For instance, last Sunday, a newly-converted member of the church, who sits near the door, said he'd fill me full of holes if I didn't speak louder."—Harlem Life.

SUNDAY-SCHOOL teacher (to little girl): "Do you say your prayers every night before going to bed?" Little girl (promptly): "No, ma'am." Sunday-school teacher: "Are you not afraid to go to sleep without asking God to watch over you during the darkness?" "No, ma'am, I'm not afraid, 'cause I sleep in the middle."—Firefly.

A METHODIST minister from New York went to Maine some years ago to deliver a lecture, and was entertained by a Congregational deacon, and while he was there he learned that there had been a very long and severe drouth in the state of Maine. When it came time for evening prayer, the deacon said to the minister: "Now, we have had a long and dry time, and when you offer prayer, pray the Lord for rain." The minister prayed ardently for rain. There came a wild storm in the night. Rain fell in torrents. The next morning the deacon found that almost all the hillside had been washed down in the doorway, and the fields were despoiled of their harvests, and he was heard to mutter to himself: "Oh, how these Methodists do exaggerate!"

THE WIDOW'S DEATH-BED.

"In the resurrection, therefore, when they shall rise, whose wife shall she be of them, for the seven had her to wife?"—Mark xii, 23.

THE widow lay on her dying bed, With candles at foot and candles at head, And feebly turned to the priest and said: "Father, good father, my soul to-night, In an hour, perchance, takes its last long flight; In an hour, perchance, I shall stand in the light Of the great white throne, borne down with affright— For the weight of my sins is crushing me quite,

But deeper than this is my present care, Deeper the depth of my dark despair, For my greatest trouble is how I shall fare When I meet with my various husbands there.

For each of the seven—or was it eight?— I promised to meet at the great gold gate; Each, as the death-mist dimmed his eye, Each, as his soul was about to fly, With gasping sigh that was half a cry, Said to me, "Sweetest, you and I Must part, but 'tis only to meet on high."

Or some such conventional bathos as this; And then, with a lingering, ultimate kiss, They successively started for heavenly bliss.

But, father, the thought that oppresses my soul Is what will occur when I reach the goal, And find eight cherubs, in white robes, wait

My coming, at old St. Peter's gate? Will they, in the shocked archangel's sight, Disgrace themselves by a stand-up fight? And if they don't, but agree to share My charms, will celestial society stare And turn up its nose? And, oh, need I fear

The unmarried seraphim's maidenly sneer? And if I flirt with each and all, Will respectable angels refuse to call? Will the inner circle around the throne Begin to talk in a spiteful tone Of fast young minxes, and purse their lips, And gather their skirts round sanctified hips, When we meet to drink water of life in sips?

Will—here came a cough, a smothering sigh, A moan—and the lady had gone to try.

—J. W. Dinsdale, in Lucifer.

AN ANTIDOTE ANALYZED. Reply to a Christian who had attacked Freethinkers, and exposing the inconsistency of Christians generally. H. C. Luse.

BIBLE TEMPERANCE. Showing that Liquor Drinking is Commanded, Defended, and Enjoined by the Bible. Edwin C. Walker.

CHRISTIANITY A REWARD FOR CRIME. Authenticated by the Bible. O. B. Whitford, M.D.

DID MAN FALL? Is the Garden of Eden a Fact? Israel W. Groh.

EPIDEMIC DELUSIONS. A Lecture by Frederic R. Marvin, M.D. Giving reasonable reasons for Religious and other Delusions.

FALSE CLAIMS OF THE CHURCH. John E. Remsburg's most noted work, and one of the most effective ever written by any Freethinker.

FIRST EPISTLE OF BENNETT THE APOSTLE TO THE TRUTH SEEKERS. Written while journeying in and near the land of Yahweh. Containing the best moral instructions of the world from the great teachers of the former ages. D. M. Bennett.

THE GIANT DELUSION. A paper read before the Freethought International Congress at Chicago. One of Otto Wettstein's fraternal attacks on Spiritualism.

THE GLORY OF INFIDELITY. To which is added a poem on Thomas Paine. One of Samuel P. Putnam's most brilliant lectures. Every Christian who asks the idiotic question, "What Has Infidelity Done?" should be induced to read this book, if he has to be paid to do it.

HOW CAN WE BE SAVED? Was Jesus Supernaturally Conceived, and did he Rise from the Dead? Israel W. Groh.

INGERSOLL AND JESUS. Showing how the two agree. A poem by Samuel P. Putnam.

THE LIMITATIONS OF TOLERANCE. A discussion between Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, Hon. Frederic R. Conder, Ex-Gov. Stewart L. Woodford, before the Nineteenth Century Club of New York. "Each man has the same right to express to the whole world his ideas that the rest of the world have to express their thoughts to him." Colonel Ingersoll maintains this, the others deny it. Mr. Conder is a Roman Catholic, Mr. Woodford a Protestant.

MATERIALISM: Its History, and Its Influence Upon Society. Dr. Louis Buchner.

MIRACLES AND MIRACLE WORKERS. A Consideration of the Marvels and Miracles of the New Testament. One of John Peck's best books.

MOSES BEFORE THE COURT, or The Forgery of the Old Testament. Dedicated to the Clergy. H. J. Seignemur, M.D.

THE NEW GOD. "It is an open secret that man has always made his Gods. They exist in and through him, as the image exists in and through the mirror. Take away man and you take away God—the image vanishes." This pamphlet, therefore, is a consideration of what kind of a God man should make. Samuel P. Putnam.

ORTHODOXY. A lecture by Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll, and one of that great man's best. The subjects considered are: Orthodox Religion Dying Out, Religious Deaths and Births, The Religion of Reciprocity, Mohammed, The Destruction of Art, The Discovery of America, Copernicus and Kepler, Charles Darwin, Special Providence, The Latest Creed, God as a Governor, The Love of God, The Fall of Man, The Atonement, The Second Birth, Inspiration, The Reign of Truth and Love, The Wars It Brought, The Resurrection, The Judgment-Day, Pious Evasions, "No Bible, No Civilization," Miracles of the New Testament, The Ascension, Casting out Devils, Necessity of Belief, Eternal Punishment, Some Who Are Damned, What I Believe, Immortality. This lecture is on the famous text, "The Clergy know that I know that they do not know."

PERSONAL EXISTENCE AFTER DEATH IMPROBABLE. L. R. Smith.

PROCEEDINGS OF THE CIVIL RIGHTS MASS MEETING AT LINCOLN HALL, WASHINGTON. Being the Speeches of Hon. FREDERICK DOUGLASS and COL. ROBERT G. INGERSOLL on the Decision of the United States Court that the Civil Rights Act is Unconstitutional. Fifty-three large octavo pages, of which Colonel Ingersoll's speech occupies 38 pages.

PULPIT, PEW, AND CRADLE. So long as the Pulpit speaks to believing Pews composed chiefly of mothers, the cradle will be rocked by ghosts and the race will remain on its knees to a devil of its own creation and to a God who is powerless against him. One of Helen Gardner's brightest efforts.

THE RELIGION OF HUMANITY BETTER THAN ETERNAL PUNISHMENT. M. Babcock.

RELIGIOUS PROBLEMS. One of L. K. Washburn's best lectures, and it is, like all of his, very good.

THE ROARING LION ON THE TRACK. One of M. Babcock's comical sermons.

SCIENCE vs. RELIGION, or The Conflict Between Reason and Superstition. T. C. Widdcombe.

ST. MATTHEW BEFORE THE COURT. Presenting the evidence of the forgery of his alleged gospel. H. J. Seignemur.

SISTER LUCY AND HER AWFUL DISCLOSURES REGARDING NEW HALL CONVENT. Showing that Convents are inimical to chastity, virtue, and freedom.

SPIRITUALISM FROM A MATERIALISTIC STANDPOINT. B. F. Underwood. Written before Mr. Underwood joined the Psychic Researchers.

THUMBSCREW AND RACK. Torture Implements Employed in the 15th and 16th centuries for the promulgation of Christianity. Being the Nuremberg Collection, with specimens from the Holy Inquisition. 28 pictures. The descriptions and reflections by George E. Macdonald.

VICTOR HUGO'S ORATION ON VOLTAIRE, delivered on the one hundredth anniversary of Voltaire's death. Translated by James Parton, author of the Life of Voltaire. To which are added the three great poems of Goethe, George Eliot, and Longfellow.

WAS CHRIST CRUCIFIED? Austin Bierbower. A lawyer's consideration of the evidence of that alleged event.

WAS JESUS INSANE? A consideration of Christ's alleged acts which would lead one to that conclusion. L. K. Washburn.

WHY DON'T HE LEND A HAND? And other Agnostic Poems. Samuel P. Putnam. The title poem is perhaps the most popular of Mr. Putnam's many poems, and a great many editions of it have been called for. The other poems are: The Golden Age, The Ideal and the Real, Not Dead, but Living, Fruition, Hope, Thomas Paine, Nature's Gospel, Address to Deity, and the short poem so often recited with great effect by Charles Watts, Give Us Light.

WILL THE COMING MAN WORSHIP GOD? B. F. Underwood; written before Mr. Underwood joined the Psychic Researchers.

WOMAN: FOUR CENTURIES OF PROGRESS. A lecture delivered at the Freethinkers' International Congress at Chicago. Consider into: The Cause of Woman's Subjugation, The Canon Law and Its Effects Upon Her, Theology Never Helpful to Woman, Invention Woman's Friend, Freethought the Benefactor of Woman. Susan H. Wigton.

WOMAN: HER PAST AND PRESENT, HER RIGHTS AND WRONGS. A lecture delivered before the Woman Suffrage Association of Denver, Col., by B. F. Underwood.

Just published in a large and handsome pamphlet. Price 25 cents. Address The Truth Seeker Co., New York.

The Great Ingersoll Controversy

Containing the famous Christmas Sermon by Colonel Ingersoll, the protests thereby evoked from the ministers who think they own this country and all therein, and Colonel Ingersoll's replies to the same. A finely gotten up pamphlet. Price, 25 cents.

Liberty for Man, Woman, and Child

"Reading this lecture," remarked a friend the other day, "will make men better; for if a man reads it one night on his way home, the next night he will take along some oranges or something to his family." This lecture is gotten up in the handsome style of "Voltaire" and "Lincoln," and has as a frontispiece a fine photo-engraving of the Colonel and both his grandchildren, Eva and Robert, the little fellow upon his knee, and Eva in her high chair. It is a pretty picture, and the Colonel's millions of friends will take pleasure in it. In this pamphlet is also the Colonel's Tribute to His Brother, which so many have desired to have in convenient form. Price, 25 cents.

VOLTAIRE

"Voltaire was the greatest man of his century, and did more to free the human race than any other of the sons of men." A lecture by INGERSOLL, with portrait of Voltaire. A handsome pamphlet. Every Freethinker will surely want it. Price, 25 cents.

LINCOLN

This is Colonel INGERSOLL's great lecture, printed in a handsome pamphlet, and containing the Century's famous portrait of Lincoln—said to be the best extant. Price, 25 cents.

SHAKSPERE

"An intellectual ocean, whose waves touched all the shores of thought." A lecture by INGERSOLL, with likeness of Shakspeare from the Kesselstadt death mask. Price, 25 cents.

Travels in Faith.

By CAPT. ROBERT O. ADAMS. Being the story of his mental journey from orthodoxy to Rationalism.

Gems of Thought.

ALL our dignity lies in our thoughts.—F. Froebel.

BAD laws are the worst sort of tyranny. They derive a particular malignity from the wisdom and soundness of the rest of our institutions.—Edmund Burke.

WHAT we call "truth," guiding us to successful action and consequent maintenance of life, is simply the accurate correspondence of subject to objective relations; while "error," leading to failure and therefore toward death, is the absence of such accurate correspondence.—Herbert Spencer.

EVERY man has a right to go to church on Sunday provided he does not interfere with others in their right to go to any other church or any other place they choose. There is just as much religious liberty involved in the right to stay away from church and go to other places as there is in the right to stay away from other places and go to church.—New York World.

PRIESTS and ministers, bishops and exhorters, presiding elders and popes, have filled the world with slanders, with calumnies about Voltaire. I am amazed that ministers will not or cannot tell the truth about an enemy of the church. As a matter of fact, for more than one thousand years, almost every pulpit has been a mint in which slanders have been coined.—Ingersoll.

WIDEN the view. Be not impatient. Do not hasten circumstance. It will grow. Growth does not only bestow, it conserves. Should I force my philosophy upon unwillingness? That would be counter-invasion. I pick what I can from events as they come. I am content to follow the gradual years. I never lose sense of direction. For every victory won or defeat suffered, somehow my picture grows clearer.—Horace L. Trumbull.

THERE will be classes as long as man remains a progressive being—classes based upon intellect, culture, and vocation. A more equitable reign of justice will strengthen those classes, emphasize their individuality and bless their labors. The effort to array class against class is the work of the demagogue who never flourishes except in the paradise of fools. There is a quest for justice which may be carried out, strengthening while every noble element in our civilization, hastening all evil at the same time to obsolescence. Bitter class hatred damns humanity, and let him be damned who arouses it. The peaceful, pervasive method of reason and righteousness should be employed. They bring the quickest harvests of permanent good, and entail no bedraggling inheritance of wrong upon us.—Progressive Age.

A MAN, a hero, ruthless Death hath slain;
A prince we loved, high worshiped, is no more;
His lips dropt truth, as heaven the gentle rain,

Yet fraught with dangers priests might well deplore.

Huxley is dead! his masterwork is o'er;
But, from the solid bases he hath laid,
Shall rise a temple seen from furthest shore—

Truth's lofty fane, with rarest gems arrayed;

The eye that scans its beauty, nevermore
Shall quail before the serried shafts of Error.

Thrice blest the man, and halest at the core,

Who lifts from myriad lives a pall of terror.
When Time declares that Truth shall be revered, Shall Huxley's honored name be more and more endeared.

—Loth, in Agnostic Journal.

TAKEN on another ground the moral supremacy of the community is a term that has in a great degree become a superstition, to be worked like all previous superstitions to the oppression and hurt of the individual. The rights of the community are neither more nor less than the rights of each individual composing the community, and therefore the community has no legitimate function to perform except that of protecting the rights of the individual. What the latter cannot always do for himself the former is expected and authorized to do for him, and that is about all. Rights are not acquired or transferred by the mere fact of association—nothing is got by it but power. Hence a thousand or a million units making a community, have no more right to commit murder than the units themselves had before the combination. A writer in a modern publication declares that "the rights of the individual man are to-day not worth consideration." It may be so at a certain point and up to a certain limit, but is very far from being so absolutely. If an individual has no rights, simply because he has become a fractional part of a community, then he manifestly has no responsibility either. The two go together. So if the individual may not kill another individual, neither may a community of individuals kill one of its component parts.—Banner of Light.

THE ELIXIR OF LIFE

is not in magic potions, "specifics" or electric clap-net, but only in wisdom—THE SCIENCE OF HEALTH. Wise men study nature, then disease learn to maintain vigor and regain it by reading the most complete book of Medical, Social, Sexual Science, by an eminent physician of 35 years experience. The "old, original, standard" work, endorsed by all, imitated by many, equalled by none. Inspired by wish to aid humanity, it has providentially saved thousands. Its essays on marriage, parentage, adaptation, marital failures, etc., are of inestimable value to all now married or who ever expect to be. The last edition has 1,000 pages, 3 colored charts of vital organs, 200 wood cuts, 21 chromos showing origin of life—development of man. APPENDIX has over 200 Recipes. A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait-painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—Freethinkers' Magazine.

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of his volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—Boston Investigator.

A small farm of 10 acres 86 perches, located within one and a half miles of Media county seat and within four miles of Chester, Pa., on the Delaware river. Several springs of soft water. good timber growing on the place, some choice apple and pear trees in fruiting condition. House and barn on the place, but are old buildings. Within five minutes' walk of the railroad station, 9 miles from Philadelphia. Trolley line between Media and Chester, with less than five minutes' walk.

The place is specially well located for a florist, and it would be a fine summer residence for one who would put a modern house on it. Eight years ago the land adjoining sold for $618 per acre, and no land near it has sold as low as that since. Several smaller places have sold at $1,000 per acre. The land slopes toward the southwest, overlooking beautiful woodland scenery.

THE PLACE CAN BE BOUGHT FOR $3,500.

WHAT UNCLE SAM SHOULD DO WITH THE FANATICS WHO WANT THE BIBLE IN OUR SCHOOLS.

Special NEW SUBSCRIBER Offer.

We wish, for two good and valid reasons, to greatly extend the circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER. First, we want its influence for good and its efforts for greater liberty of thought to be more widely distributed, and consequently more effective. Second, we want more subscribers to help pay its expenses and enable us to do more work. And we wish to emphasize both of these reasons. Our present subscribers can do a great deal for us if they will, and to get them to aid us we are willing to reward them; we therefore make this SPECIAL NEW SUBSCRIBER OFFER:

To any subscriber now on our list who will get a new name for the list for one year, sending us three dollars for the same, we will send free a copy of the FREETHINKER'S PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK, in board covers (price TWO DOLLARS).

And to anyone whose name is not now on our list we make this offer: Send us three dollars for the paper one year, and we will send you free the PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK.

The pictures in the FREETHINKER'S PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK were made and the text written to show the absurdity and untruthfulness of the Church's claim to being a divine and beneficent institution, and to reveal the abuses of a union of church and state. It has 185 Full-page Illustrations, with copious citations of Facts, History, Statistics, and Opinions of Scholars to maintain the argument of the Artist. The Designs are by WATSON HESTON and include a portrait of the designer. The pictures are classified as follows: Of those representing Uncle Sam and the Priests there are 16; representing The Church 'Robbing the People, 2; Thanksgiving, 3; Sabbath Laws, 6; Children and the Church, 11; Woman and the Church, 10; The Church and Thomas Paine, 6; Studies in Natural History, 4; The Bible and Science, 2; The Clergy and Their Flocks, 15; Piety in Our Penitentiaries, 1; The Atonement Scheme, 4; The Lord and His Works, 4; Prayer, 2; The Creeds, 10; Christians and Mohammedans, 1; Samples of Christianity's Work, 2; Missionaries, 5; The Lord's Instruments, 1; Bible Doctrines and Their Results, 25; Church and Slavery, 1; Priests and Politics, 2; Ireland and the Church, 4; Church Ideas of Civilization, 2; Uses of the Cross, 1; Unkind Reflections on the Church, 4; Persecutions by the Church, 9; Some Allegories, 12; Heaven, 3; Hell, 6; Miscellaneous, 7

This offer cannot apply to renewals. Premiums for them can be found on the second page of this issue. We are giving five dollars' worth for three in this offer, and there is no profit in it except that we shall get many renewals of these subscriptions; the subscribers will also, probably, buy a few books from time to time, and the small margin on them may make us whole. Induce your neighbor to subscribe, and so get the book for yourself. Or, if you are not now a subscriber, send us three dollars and get both paper and book—FIVE DOLLARS' WORTH FOR THREE DOLLARS.

Read what the papers and people have said of the book and see if it is not worth while to make a strong effort to obtain it. The book has had a large run; five thousand copies have been sold, and everyone who paid two dollars for it says it is worth a good deal more. Now we are giving it away, and you can get a copy if you will. Do not delay, but get it now.

SPECIMEN PRESS NOTICES.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait-painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—Freethinkers' Magazine.

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of this volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—Boston Investigator.

Send us a new subscriber and get the book free of all expense to you. Or, if you are not now a subscriber, send us $3 and get the book and the paper for one year.

LAMAR, Mo., May 8, 1895.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: The "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book" is received, and after a careful examination of the work I unhesitatingly pronounce it one of the most impressive Freethought works ever issued from the press. It will indeed "corner the parson" and all his flock, and I shall take great pleasure in showing the book to my orthodox friends. As a reference book it is invaluable, and it should find a place in every Freethinker's library.

Respectfully, W. F. BAILY.

LIST OF PREMIUMS WITH THE TRUTH SEEKER

When Renewing Your Subscription, Take Advantage of These Good Offers

For $6.50 we will send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year ($3) and S. P. Putnam's "Four Hundred Years of Freethought" ($5). Large Octavo, 1150 pages, gilt sides and back, marbled edges—the most magnificent work ever issued by the Freethought Press. 140 Half Tone Engravings of the Prominent Freethinkers of the past four centuries.

The object of this work is to present the Course of Freethought throughout the Civilized World from the time of Columbus and Bruno to the time of Ingersoll. It is a radical Historic Record of the greatest developments of the human race. It reveals Freethought as an intellectual, moral, literary, social, industrial, and political movement. It shows what Freethought is in itself, how manifold are its influences, and with what promise we can hail its future triumph. "FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT" embraces the most illustrious pages of human history, adorned with the brightest genius, radiant with the most splendid poetry, rich with the greatest inventions and discoveries, and ennobled with freedom's most shining advance. Nothing can be more interesting or more inspiring to the pioneer workers of to-day, to those who are still in the van for human rights and progress. No Liberal can afford to be without this book. It contains the greatest thoughts and the greatest deeds of the greatest men in one harmonious and magnificent whole, a vivid picture of man's sublimest evolution, with the added glory of woman's emancipation from the chains and slavery of a barbaric church.

Darwin and After Darwin

An Exposition of the Darwinian Theory.

By GEORGE J. ROMANES.

A systematic Exposition of what may be termed the Darwinism of Darwin, and intended to be of service to the general reader rather than to professional naturalists.

Mr. Romanes is well known as one of the most interesting of English writers upon evolution, besides ranking with Professor Huxley in scientific knowledge and ability. And this is a part of his conclusion regarding the great subject of Design, to which the church so often refers: "Thus whether we look to the facts of adaptation or to those of beauty, everywhere throughout organic nature we meet with abundant evidence of natural causation, while nowhere do we meet with any independent evidence of supernatural design. Adaptation and beauty are alike receiving their explanation at the hands of a purely mechanical philosophy. . . . All nature has thus been transformed before the view of the present generation in a manner and to an extent that has never before been possible, and inasmuch as the change which has taken place has taken place in the direction of naturalism, and this to the extent of rendering the mechanical interpretation of nature universal, it is no wonder if the religious mind has suddenly awakened to a new and a terrible force in the words of its traditional enemy—Where is now thy God?"

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with a little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroine. The narrative is, in the main, a history of a working-girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business-men, kind hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrites. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Freethinkers Are Not Deceived.

A discursiv contemporary rejoices exceedingly over the platform put out by the Political Reform Union at its recent Prohibition Park meeting. The discursiv contemporary says that the platform is just what it has wanted for a long time, and that "Infidels" can find no flaw in it, for it does not mention "God" nor the Sabbath! And a gentleman in Pennsylvania, who certainly should know better, hastens to say that the discursiv contemporary's estimate of the Union Reformers' platform suits him to a "t." If the editor of the discursiv contemporary were informed, as every editor should be, regarding the men and influences under that platform, he would know that it was built for a trap to catch just such people as himself—men who are not informed and can not or will not make the investigation necessary to inform themselves. A man must be blind who cannot see what these schemers are after, especially when John G. Woolley, one of the star conspirators, so kindly exhibited the machinery that operates the talking Madonna. He distinctly said that the plan of political union for which he was working "honors the church and enforces the Sabbath." He proposes that all who are laboring for the various theocratic and paternalistic "reforms" now on the boards shall "combine politically in the name of Jesus Christ the Conqueror, and form an interpartisan order of independent voters, whose entire scope shall be the head of the ticket, in federal, state, judicial, and municipal elections." In pursuance of this plan, the platform which has so struck the erratic fancy of the discursiv contemporary was constructed, with the distinct aim of catching enough voters to secure control of the executive officers so as to enforce the prohibitory and Sabbath laws now on the statute books, with the ultimate object of electing the legislative bodies and enacting such new laws as may be needed to complete the triumph of the conspirators.

Mr. Woolley boasts that the party standing on the platform which has fooled the discursiv contemporary is "a new clean party built on Jesus Christ." "The church is in politics," he says, in illustrating the modus operandi of his plan; and the Christian Statesman looks for the success of the God-in-the-Constitution party through the triumph of some of these "reforms" engineered by Woolley and his astute confères and supported by such dupes as the discursiv contemporary. God and the Sabbath were left out of the platform adopted at Prohibition Park because the makers of that platform were fishing for suckers—and they are catching them—a very few of them.

Specimen Theocratic Arguments.

The Christian Reformer of August 3d begins its editorial utterances with these words:

"It is difficult to tell just where to draw the line that bounds religious liberty and separates it from an immoral and corrupting license, but it is necessary often to draw the line in an authoritative manner."

After acknowledging the difficulty of drawing the line mentioned, the Christian Reformer proceeds without hesitation to draw it as though it had full authority so to do. The religious believers who style themselves "saints" or "holiness people" have recently been holding services in Pittsburg. The neighbors came to regard them as nuisances, which they may or may not have been, and it does not matter, for that was not the question raised, so far as we can gather from the report in and arguments of the Covenanter paper.

"It is stated that the so-called 'holy kiss' was practiced. The conversation, teaching, and practice of these people are said to be of a very questionable nature. A printed circular was issued and circulated by them which the superintendent of police pronounced to be demoralizing and obscene. They were ordered to take down their tent and leave the city. Evidently the right to worship God according to the dictates of conscience does not carry with it the right to practice immorality in the name of religion."

Let us briefly analyze these charges and arguments, for the whole story sounds theocratic and smells fishy. There are five passages in the New Testament in which the early Christians are commanded to greet one another with a holy kiss, and in none of them is anything said about "so-called" holy kisses. From all of which it would appear that the Christian has ample warrant for giving and receiving this salutation, but the modern Christian has a horror of obeying Bible commands, as is evidenced by his almost total disregard of the teachings of Jesus and his fierce persecution of the few of his brethren who do attempt to be Bible Christians. In proof of this, notice the hounding of the Seventh-day Adventists and the vituperation poured out on those who prove that the Bible is not a witness for either temperance or prohibition.

The fact that the "conversation, teaching, and practice" of any body of people are "said" to be of a "questionable nature" does not give any official a right to order them out of town. Deprivation of citizen rights is not permissible on mere hearsay; every person accused of wrong-doing is entitled to a fair trial and should not be punished unless and until guilt is proved. Neither has the chief of police authority to pass on the character of printed or written matter. He is merely a peace officer, not a literary censor, a judge, nor a member of a jury. The average policeman is not morally or intellectually qualified to decide upon the merits or demerits of literary productions, even if he had the legal authority for so doing, which he has not. It is probable that the circular of the "holiness people" had nothing in it worse than can be found in the Bible, and it is likely that everything in it was based on the teachings and positive commands of that fetic. Would the chief of police of Pittsburg have ordered anyone out of the city for circulating the Bible? Would the Christian Reformer have applauded the banishment of any one for such an offense? Consistency never was a conspicuous virtue of Christians. But the previously quoted statements and assertions of the Reformer do not reveal the real animus of that journal and its allies.

It reproduces from the Pittsburg Commercial Gazette some comments which show what is meant by all such petty persecutions by officials who usually act as the "powers behind the throne" dictate. Read this:

"When a body of men and women have rendered themselves amenable to charges of immorality, obscenity, and blasphemy, and seek defense or palliation on the plea of religious freedom, the police seldom make a mistake in compelling them to 'move on.'"

When an editor knows so little about the Constitution of his country and the rights of man as to claim that men and women may justly be ordered to "move on" because somebody thinks them guilty of "blasphemy," his opinions regarding what constitutes immorality and obscenity will be found so distorted by theological prejudice and superstition as to be unworthy of serious attention. This Pittsburg daily ought to know that in the United States there is no such crime as "blasphemy," except in a few belated provinces like Maryland and Pennsylvania, and that there blasphemy laws are flagrantly violative of the spirit of the Constitution, and gross anachronisms in this age of science and rationalism. This argument of the Commercial Gazette and the subsequent demands of the theocratic organ necessarily make us very doubtful of the reality of the "immorality and obscenity" charged against the holiness people. It is probable that those charges are as unsubstantial as that of "blasphemy." But more than this—how have these people "rendered themselves amenable" to such charges? Have they had a trial, as the Constitution guarantees? Who knows that they have rendered themselves amenable to the charge either of obscenity or blasphemy? By what authority does the chief of police proceed against them, even under the antiquated laws of Pennsylvania, if he has no warrant to arrest them or if they have not been tried and found guilty? Is not the order of expulsion simply a concession to popular clamor made by an officer too cowardly to take the responsibility of arresting and holding for trial probably innocent persons?

The Commercial Gazette says further that "offenses against good morals, orderly government, and common decency cannot be cloaked under the pretext of [freedom of] religious belief." Among these offenses the editor has included the fictitious crime of "blasphemy," and thus we are served with notice that whatever the civil powers, acting under instruction from the church, declare to be blasphemous is "against good morals, orderly government, and common decency," and, as such, is to be suppressed by law. And this is from a daily paper that owes the very possibility of its own existence to freedom of thought and expression. Once more it says:

"Men and women may accept, and even proclaim, any theory or dogma which may commend itself to their judgment, but when they begin to organize churches as a means of making converts, and entering upon practices which the customs and laws of the country forbid, they cannot escape by drawing around them the shield of religious toleration."

That is, people have rights if they do not attempt to make use of them! It is to be noted that the customs of the country are as sacred as its laws, which would make it very uncomfortable for the Chinese with his queue and the Turkish woman with her thick veil. Only the narrowest of narrow provincialism talks in that way. But narrow as it is, it is altogether too broad for the Christian Reformer, which says that the tone of the extract is correct, but that the line between true liberty and license is not drawn in the right place. It objects to permitting men to accept and proclaim such dogmas as their judgments commend, and yet denying to them the right to organize for the propagation of those dogmas. Now, do not think for a moment that it is going to propose to give them the same right to organize that the secular paper concedes to them to individually hold and proclaim their opinions. Far from it:

"The broad principle, so often stated by writers on personal liberty, is, that whenever anyone's conduct affects injuriously the rights of others, the state has a right to interfere. In the exercise of its police authority the state may suppress whatever injures the public either physically, financially, or morally."

This is indeed a "broad" principle! Under it any tyranny is possible. The true statement is that invasion may be repelled and punished. That is the boundary of the province of the state. To permit it to do more is to open the way for all possible kinds of persecutions by the majority of the hour. Why did not the Reformer say that the state might also rightfully suppress what it thinks will injure the public, i. e., individuals, intellectually? Because that demand would have shown the most stupid that it was aiming to outlaw unorthodox opinions, which is indisputably religious persecution, and it virtuously protests against any such imputation. It finds it necessary to mask its real purposes behind the pretexts of preserving the property of the citizen from theft, his health from contagion, and his morals from corruption. Once it was perfectly safe to imprison, mangle, and murder avowedly to save souls from hell, but the rise of Freethought and the development of science have forced the church to work under cover, to do its crimes in the name of human earthly virtues and needs. "Blasphemy" is no longer a crime against the gods, it is an injury to the "morals of the public." "Obscenity" and "morality" are to-day the shibboleths of the tyrants and the would-be tyrants, and whosoever is fooled thereby is not wise. Immediately following the last sentence before quoted, the Covenanter paper says:

"This will apply to public speaking and the printed page as well as to the formation of unlawful organizations. There is a paper published in New York called THE TRUTH SEEKER, which week after week contains blasphemous language and still more blasphemous pictures. If the tone of public morals were what it should be, this paper would be suppressed as calculated to affect injuriously the morals of the public. It seems clear that it is a violation of the law to send it through the mails. Our officers usually transgress on the side of leniency, and not on the side of severity, in the enforcement of law."

This is at once frank and deceptiv. It is frank in the open avowal of the desire to "stamp out" Freethought publications, but deceptiv as regards the reasons given for the desire. Instead of honestly saying that THE TRUTH SEEKER should be suppressed because it antagonizes the claims of the Christian church and is opposed to the union of religion and the state, it is asserted that the paper injures the "morals of the public," by which, it is to be presumed, is meant the morals of individuals who read its arguments or gaze upon its pictures. "Public morals" and the "morals of the public," as distinguished from the morals of the constituent individuals who compose the community, are absolute fictions, and only a mind steeped in superstition could for a moment entertain the idea of their existence. THE TRUTH SEEKER has not degraded the morals of its readers. It has advocated the use of the reason in the examination of the creeds of all the churches of the world; it has protested against teaching to the children of the land the monstrous falsehood that the crimes recorded in the Bible, and there attributed to Yahveh, were commanded by a god infinit in power and justice; it has shown that the devastations of nature are inconsistent with the ethics of civilized man, and it has demanded that all citizens be equal before the law, regardless of their belief or unbelief. There is nothing immoral in this, nothing calculated to make one man invade the rights of any other man. If the editor of the Christian Reformer cannot see this, we are not responsible; we cannot engage to clear his brain of theological cobwebs; he is joined to his idols. The best that we can do is to warn the people of the United States against the treasonable machinations of him and his fellow-conspirators. He never attempts to answer our arguments, and only once has any of the theocrats essayed to dispose of our facts, and that was when we gave some of the figures which convicted the Sabbatarians of wholesale forgery and petition-stuffing in connection with the attempt to close the World's Fair on Sunday. They retired after one skirmish; it is so much easier to advocate the suppression of your adversary than it is to answer his arguments and explain or otherwise dispose of his facts. Logically and historically, it is the Christian method of argument.

We do not think that the postal laws have yet been made quite orthodox enough to prevent the circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER through the mails, although that has been the object of many amendments proposed to the original Comstock statutes. Undoubtedly, if such extreme bigots as the editor of the Christian Reformer could determine the application of the existing statutes, there would be no difficulty in shutting us up and stopping the paper; in fact, these reactionists would do all that on general principles, if they could sit on the bench and in the jury-box, with no higher authority to nullify their usurpations. They are equal to the commission of any crime of the kind, as ready as Torquemada and Calvin were to suppress dissent and torture heretics. They lack only the power, and, at the present rate of movement backward here in the United States, they will not very much longer be without the power. But there will be no surrender on the part of the wide-awake Freethinkers, and we hope sometime to see the American people get their eyes open to the real state of affairs; then they will appreciate the gravity of the situation, and stop fraternizing with religious despots masked as reformers.

Infamous!

"Birdie was only four years old, but she had already been taught that God loved her, and always took care of her. One day there was a heavy thunderstorm and Birdie's sisters and mamma even laid by their sewing and drew their chairs into the middle of the room, pale and trembling with fear. But Birdie stood close by the window, watching the storm with bright eyes. 'Oh mamma! a'in't that bu'fu!' she cried, clapping her hands with delight, as a vivid flash of lightning burst from the black clouds, and the thunder pealed and rattled over their heads. 'It is God's voice, Birdie,' said mamma, and her voice trembled. 'He talks very loud, don't he, mamma? S'pose it is so as deaf Betsy can hear, and the other deaf folks.' 'O Birdie! come straight away from that window,' said one of her sisters, whose cheeks were blanched with fear. 'What for?' asked Birdie. 'Oh! because the lightning is so sharp, and it thunders so loud.' But Birdie shook her head, and, looking over her shoulder with a happy smile on her face, lisped out: 'If it funder, let it funder! 'Tis God makes it funder, and he'll take care of me. I ain't a bit afraid to hear God talk, Maizy.'" — Sunday-School Times.

"A Child's Beautiful Faith," is the heading the Sunday-School Times puts on the foregoing silly, demoralizing trash. "Child's beautiful faith"! Shame on the parent who will put the trusting innocence of inexperienced childhood to such a test as that! The man who will print and send out among little children such cruelly false assertions as are contained in that story is either an imbecil or an intellectual prostitute. He should be lashed by the whip of ridicule and cut by the knives of indignant criticism until he is shamed and terrified into silence. The courtesies of debate are wasted upon creatures with souls so small as his. His worthless—ten times worse than worthless—sheet has a circulation of more than 150,000 copies. It carries the leprosy of ignorance and falsehood into every home where it is permitted to crawl. It fattens on credulity and leaves a trail of moral death wherever it goes. It caters to the most besottedly uncultivated, the most reactionary elements in the Christian church. Every Christian to-day who has even a smattering of modern education knows that the thunder is not the voice of a god; he knows that the lightning will kill the trusting child as quickly as it will the worst criminal in the world; he knows that such teachings as that of the Sunday-School Times imperil lives by making the ignorant and faith-guided neglect the precautions that would often save them, and he knows that when the child so taught grows up it will learn that its mother was a liar and is not to be trusted. In this idiotic story the mother's own voice trembled when she said that the thunder was God's voice; she knew that the lightning might strike her down, god or no god, even while she was telling the conventional lie to the little one, just as she had probably told it the other conventional lie that the doctor found it in the garden. Even the elder sister had sense enough to keep away from the open window, for she had lost some of her faith, but the baby, believing the lies of its mother, remained in the place of danger. One might as well talk of the "beautiful faith" of the child who, having been taught that "God loved her, and always took care of her," should bend trustingly down to kiss a rattlesnake, coiled and with head thrown back ready to drive its deadly fangs into her flesh. Such faith is not beautiful; it is ugly, it is deplorable, it is heart-rending. Erasez l'infame!

Mr. Putnam will soon be back in this country to look after the fall joint convention of the Free-thought Federation of America and the American Secular Union. His last lecture in England will be in London on the first Sunday in September. Mr. Foote, the president of the English Secularists, will superintend the affair and preside at the meeting. A dinner will also be given in Mr. Putnam's honor a few days before he sails from Southampton. It will probably be a good one, as the tickets are sold for it at four shillings each, which, we understand, will buy a good meal in England, and so our representative will not be sent home hungry. This will do much to obliterate the strained feeling between this country and England consequent upon the hilarity of a small tea-party some years back.

Governor Atkinson, of Georgia, has issued a proclamation in which he thanks God for having, as he alleges, delivered him "from the perils of a most serious sickness." This is praying on the house-tops instead of in the closet, with a vengeance. It is now time for this phenomenally brilliant chief executiv to issue another proclamation, setting forth that, as the seven doctors he subsequently employed made him sick, he wants the people of Georgia to know it and God to give them a taste of brimstone for it. If God cured him but had no hand in putting him on the sick-bed, is it not logical to infer that the doctors were responsible for making him sick in the first place? It is a very poor rule that will not work both ways, although Governor Atkinson does not seem to know it. Perhaps the editor of the Macon News is his theological adviser.

A writer in a Boston paper says:

"A system of religion that disputes the right of existence to all other religious systems, and that claims the exclusiv right to God's mercy in the world to come, invites opposition and attack, and cannot intelligently be called religious, certainly not American."

That exactly describes Christianity, although the writer had in mind only one division of Christianity. It is the fundamental claim of the Christian church that man is eternally lost unless he accepts the terms of salvation offered by God through Christ. Christ is man's redeemer from the hell that was earned by Adam, and the King of this world. So says the church, Catholic and Protestant and Greek. The doctrine of exclusiv salvation through Christ has inundated the world with blood and whitened plain and valley and mountain side with the bones of murdered millions. When Christianity yields this claim to monopoly of God's favor she yields everything.

A few days ago an Italian was arrested in this city for selling ice on Sunday. He was doing an excellent business from his wagon. Taken before Magistrate Cornell, the latter said:

"It's a crying shame to arrest a man for selling ice in the tenement districts. Why, ice is a necessity on such a close, hot day as this. I wish I could let you go, Bacco; but, unfortunately, as the law stands, I must hold you in $100 for Special Sessions."

What can be said in defense of a law when even the judges on the bench declare that it is a "crying shame" to enforce it? But such are the laws that

With regard to the merely contingent, or, as it may be called, constructiv injury which a person causes in society by conduct which neither violates any specific duty to the public nor occasions perceptible hurt to any assignable individual except himself, the inconvenience is one which society can afford to bear for the sake of the greater good of human freedom.—John Stuart Mill.

News and Notes.

Shakspeare's day! What a day it was—of joy, of roses, of bloom and splendor; a day when man and nature blend in perfect poesy. The home of Shakspeare, the river Avon, the green fields, the beautiful church, the embowering groves, the thousand flowers, make a world of delight; the past and present mingling in glory and romance. What memories illuminate the brain at the magic word "Shakspeare!" what a long procession moves athwart the mind, what pomp, what variety, what passion, what power. And here is the land of his birth. Here he gathered the treasures of nature, here he caught the music of the birds and plucked the flowers, here he felt the flame of love and the grand ambition of youth, and here, after the triumphs of an eventful life, he found the repose of death. How the heart thrills and the imagination kindles at Stratford-upon-Avon! Scott, Burns, Byron, and then Shakspeare, who comprehends them all in the amplitude of his genius and enriches them and us so that poetry and art hereafter are a common heritage, like the earth, and sun, and sky.

I did not come a solitary pilgrim to this memorable shrine. Not simply the dead, but the living world itself was round about my pathway, as variable as the pages of Shakspeare himself, and the comedy of life softened and glorified its tragedy. Like Chaucer's company, we found as much wisdom in play as in labor itself, and certainly no one can appreciate Shakspeare who does not see the joy of life as well as its shadows.

I must describe the companions of my delightful journey, who added the luster of Freethought to the reminiscences of the poetic past.

Robert Taylor is the captain of the Birmingham host, and, after being twenty-three years in the military service of his country, is fully capable for the position. He has traveled over a good part of the Old World, and expects eventually to see the New. He is a jolly story-teller. He has gathered his materials from many a campfire and curious adventure, and there is not a subject he cannot illuminate with some telling anecdote. James Partidge, the secretary, is a quiet and persevering man, and does the hard and silent work without which there is no public success. W. T. Pitt, the treasurer, has the knack of paying all the bills, which makes the passage of life a free-and-easy one to the Secular Pilgrim. Joseph H. Ridgway, vice-president of the society, I have already referred to as a stalwart veteran. Mr. Stephen Armfield was ordained to preach the gospel according to Methodism, but found in Freethought and hard work a better field for humanity and truth. David Thomas Bullocks is the singer of our party, who puts the music in where it does the most good, and adds to the festivity and romance of the occasion; and Charles Henry Cattell joins us with Freddie Cattell, the grandson of Charles Watts, so that my famous American co worker has the dignity of a grandsire, which, of course, he carries with vigorous ease. This was a typical English party, proud of their own land, yet cosmopolitan in spirit, literary, poetical, musical, historical, anecdotal, reminiscent, and prophetic, so there was plenty of Promethean fire all along the way.

We left Birmingham at 9 40 in the morning, and it was about 11 o'clock A.M. when we rolled into the station at Stratford-upon-Avon. Stratford has a population of about 10,000. It is one of the cleanest and handsomest towns in England at the present time. It looks like a parlor. It has quite an aspect of modern magnificence. The old parts of the town are not apparent without a searching look. Ignatius Donnelly, the anti-Shakspearean critic, says that Stratford was a "dirty little town." I can see no evidence of this. All towns were dirty three centuries ago to what they are now. London was simply horrible. Stratford was no worse than its neighbors. It was evidently a town of some importance, the center of business for an extensive agricultural country, where crowds would gather on market days, and a bright boy would have a chance to see a vast deal of human nature. It was not a country place that Shakspeare lived in, but a bustling trading-point, which would afford much stimulation and knowledge to a youthful genius. Donnelly is very much out of the way when he calls Stratford a "dirty little town" in order to belittle Shakspeare. At the time in which Shakspeare lived, Stratford might be called a leading provincial town, and of this town Shakspeare's father was the chief magistrate, and must have been a man of energy and ability. Stratford was not a stagnant village. Shakspeare was born amidst active and superior elements of English life.

The first thing to attract our attention was the handsome American monument, which is gratifying as the expression of our national feeling for England's greatest bard. They say that more Americans visit Stratford every year than Englishmen. It appears that every American tourist makes it a point to see Shakspeare's birthplace without fail.

But I cannot linger at the monument. It is too modern. I want to get back to the old times; to the very hearthstone of Shakspeare, and here, in a little while, I stand, beneath the very roof under which he was born. The big old-fashioned fireplace is before me. The iron dogs are gone, but the very stones are there where the fire glowed, and on the side are the stone seats under the chimney where, I suppose, little Willie must have sat when the embers were low and it was cold. At any rate, I sat myself down on these snug stone seats where Shakspeare might have toasted his shins. This was in the kitchen with its stone floor. Overhead is the room where Shakspeare was born; not much of a room now, but more royal than the court of any prince. I should think about a million names were scribbled all over the walls and the window-panes; among them, by careful observation, might be discerned Scott's, Byron's, Carlyle's, Dickens's, Thackeray's, etc., but it is almost impossible to distinguish. In another room opposite is a portrait of Shakspeare, probably the finest extant. To my mind it is certainly a veritable portrait, and conveys a noble impression of the poet. This portrait was discovered a few years ago among some old relics. It had a thick, heavy beard upon it. It was found, however, that this beard did not belong to the original picture, and, being carefully cleaned off, a new face appears—the face of Shakspeare himself. It is constantly guarded, being framed in a fire-proof iron safe, which is locked every night. It is a priceless treasure. I do not like the ordinary pictures of Shakspeare. They convey no impression of genius or character. One might think Shakspeare was only a comfortable burgher looking at these pictures. It is a heavy unintellectual face that confronts us, in which there seems to be no fine play of wit and cheer. But in this portrait now hung upon the walls of Shakspeare's home, and of which I believe there is no copy elsewhere, we see the real man, as described by Ben Jonson—"honest, brave, open, free, gentle, and witty." Here we see the lips that the muses might have kissed; the eyes where genius makes the world luminous, and the dome-like forehead. In connection with this portrait I am reminded of the Kesselstadt mask, which I think is the most wonderful and pathetic expression of Shakspeare's face ever given. Here we see the grandeur, the delicacy, the subtlety, the mobility of the poet-genius. Thus in the shadow of death, rather than in the fleshly lineaments of life, are revealed the depths and intensities of Shakspeare's inner being.

I cannot describe the many relics and curiosities, pictures, books, manuscripts, etc., now gathered within the poet's birthplace. Amidst the mingling rain and sunshine we journey to Shottery, about three miles from Shakspeare's early home. Here, on a bit of rising ground, is Ann Hathaway's cottage surrounded by an old garden, in which are many of the Shakspearean flowers. The cottage has been divided into three portions. The central portion is a fairly large room, with quaint chimney corner. There is an old settle with high back, and the window, under which Shakspeare might have done his courting in the "good old days." Up-stairs is a beautiful carved bedstead, which shows the care and workmanship lavished on furniture in the Middle Ages. This bedstead existed in the Hathaway house before the time of our poet. An old woman has charge of the house, a descendant of the Hathaways. She is eighty-three years old, and is a sprightly and chipper old lady. She can talk the day long. She is full of the old days, of her great-grandfather, and great-grand-aunt, etc. It was a pleasure to listen to her traditions. I liked the cottage and its surroundings. The modern look has not yet appeared as in bustling Stratford. The glamour of the old days is almost undisturbed. The garden has an ancient flavor. The flowers are in wild profusion, and we are permitted the blessed privilege of plucking a few. At Shakspeare's birthplace there is a garden in which are blooming, it is said, all the flowers spoken of in Shakspeare's drama, but the guardians will not allow one even to stroll through it, and not a petal is to be had for love or money. They are not so strict at Ann Hathaway's cottage, and you can roam around to your heart's content, and dream of the lovers of the "golden time."

There is no evidence that the poet's married life was an unhappy one; that he ever ceased his affection for his wife, or that he went to London from any other motive than an honorable desire to better his condition and that of his family. There is no evidence that he ever stole the deer or was arrested for any youthful escapade and had to run away.

There is no doubt that Shakspeare was a manly youth, honest, straightforward, energetic, and handsome. He went to London to make a fortune. He probably had many good friends to help him, among them the actors who visited his native town, and were cordially welcomed and sustained by Shakspeare's father, who was fond of dramatic entertainments. There is no evidence that Shakspeare went to London penniless, or that he was obliged to hold horses at the theater doors for a scanty living. Shakspeare was a first-class business man, practical and sagacious, if he was a poet. I have no doubt he went to London with a good capital to start with and ample support. He was the kind of a man to make friends and to keep them. Shakspeare became for his time a very wealthy man; and not by luck, but by foresight, labor, pluck, and perseverance.

From Ann Hathaway's cottage we drive to the church, a noble structure, which shows by its size and stateliness that Stratford must have been a town of note before Shakspeare's era. What a beautiful churchyard is here, the sunlight falling through the green arches upon the green grass and the solemn gravestones, even as when the poet mused and dreamed along the banks of Avon. We enter the church and wander among the memorials of the dead. We stand by the tomb of Shakspeare. I can only express myself in the noble words of Washington Irving:

"There are other monuments around, but the mind refuses to dwell on anything that is not connected with Shakspeare; his idea pervades the place, the whole pile seems to be his mausoleum. The feelings, no longer checked and thwarted by doubt, here indulge in perfect confidence. Other traces of him may be false or dubious, but here is palpable evidence and absolute certainty. As I trod the sounding pavement there was something intense and thrilling in the idea that in very truth the remains of Shakspeare were mouldering beneath my feet. It was a long time before I could prevail upon myself to leave the place, and as I passed through the church-yard I plucked a branch from one of the yew-trees, the only relic I have brought from Stratford."

As I was passing through the same church-yard I found the workman cutting down an ancient yew-tree, of which I secured a branch, also some leaves and grass, and yellow buttercups and white daisies and a beautiful red rose, in whose fading splendors I shall ever see the glory of Stratford church.

From the church-yard we walk past the great Lucy Mill, built about two centuries ago, from under whose wheel the waters of the Avon swirl and dash away; thence we pass over a foot-bridge to the other side of the river; and here for a half hour or so we remain under the stone bridge of the railway, for the rain in coming down in torrents. It was a picturesque scene, the old bridge, the mill and wheel, the church tower just beyond, glimpses of the village, a couple of fishermen on the banks, the prosperous Londoner, besides the yokel who does not seem to have changed since Shakspeare's time, and our own company trying to be as philosophical as possible. When there is a burst of sunshine we make a start over the meadows. The rain, however, has only stopped in order to make a more furious onset, which we meet just as we are half across. But the rain adds such a misty loveliness to the whole scene that I cannot but remain and enjoy it even if I do get wet to the skin. The river is flowing along, and beyond it on the wooded bank looms the church in a veil of shining mist; and the trees seem to be dripping with a million diamonds, and the grass presents the freshness and cleanliness of an emerald floor, and the roofs of the houses glitter where the columns of rain are already marching off from the advancing sun.

All this journeying and sight-seeing does at last make us hungry, hungry as bears. We therefore betake ourselves to Swan's Nest Hotel. This used to be called "The Leg of Mutton," and the picture of the leg of mutton is still there. I like the title "Leg of Mutton." It is not so euphonious as the present name, but it is more suggestive to the hungry traveler. However, it is a jolly tavern and we gather around the table and proceed to demolish about the best beefsteak I have ever tackled. As they say in Western parlance, it goes to the spot. If Shakspeare lived on such beefsteak as this, no wonder that he produced such glorious poetry. Beefsteak is much better than Bacon, I think, for Shakspeare poetry.

After the pleasant festivities of the table, we visit the Memorial Theater, Library, and Picture Gallery. This pile of buildings will always be connected with the name of Charles Fowler, who gave the grounds and worked energetically for its completion. Within is a large library devoted entirely to Shakspeare—his works printed in almost every language. In the last report is noted a donation of books in the Cingalese. In the picture gallery are portraits of actors and actresses in their great Shaksperian characters, and engravings and paintings of many of the famous scenes in the poet's plays. We climb the tower, from whence there is a vast and beautiful view of the city and surrounding country. In April, the month of Shakspeare's birth, the theater is open, and the best dramas of English literature are produced. There is generally a fortnight's festivities, and it is a wonderful occasion for the lovers of Shakspeare. From the building we pass forth into the gardens alongside the Avon, where one can sit for hours and watch the ever changing prospect and the varying faces of people from all parts of the world who come to see the memorials of England's greatest glory.

Thence I go to the grammar school where Shakspeare learned "a little Latin and less Greek." This school and the guild were in existence in the fourteenth century. The long room on the ground floor was the Guild Hall. This hall is interesting from the fact that it was the scene of dramatic representation in the poet's youth. John Shakspeare, the poet's father, greatly encouraged the drama while mayor. This was when Willie was about five years old. Does it not seem probable that the child's imagination was fired by witnessing these performances. Here is the Latin school-room in which the poet received his classical education, and the very desk is shown at which he used to study. Shakspeare went to school until his fifteenth year, when reverses in his father's estate caused him to be taken out to work on the farm. Still he might have been fitted for the university while in school. The school dates from Edward VI, and the opportunities for instruction were quite favorable. At the time of Shakspeare's youth children were sent to the English schools at the age of five, and at seven they commenced the study of Latin, the regular course taking about ten years, so that boys usually left school for university studies at the age of fifteen. Among the books read were those of Esop, Ovid, Virgil, Terence, Cicero, Horace, and Seneca. Shakspeare might have been familiar with all these authors when he left Avon. He had good opportunities for a classical education, much more than Ben Jonson gives him credit for. There is not a particle of classical scholarship displayed in Shakspeare's poems that he could not have acquired before he was fifteen years old.

From the grammar school we turn our steps to the New Place where Shakspeare passed the last years of his life. Alas! the house where Shakspeare lived is gone, only the foundation is left. It was a clergyman who cut down Shakspeare's favorite mulberry-tree in the garden, and also demolished the house itself in 1759. He left Stratford immediately amid the curses of the inhabitants. The New Place is, at present, a beautiful garden, with many lovely flowers and smooth greensward, and the old stump of the mulberry-tree, which still produces some leaves, and is now carefully guarded from the ravages of time and clergymen. I suppose the modern elegance of the place gives but little idea of what it was in Shakspeare's time, seeing that the building itself is obliterated; but here is the soil on which Shakspeare trod when he rested from his labors; and here was the serene ending of a most wonderful life. Shakspeare's mind was so full in all directions; it was in such exquisite harmony with nature and equipoise with all life, so calm and deep, that he needed no outward pomp for the expression of his genius, no palace, no "golden round," only the sweet felicity of flowers and grass and the summer's sky. The greatness of Shakspeare is shown in the placidity of his closing years.

Returning to "The Swan's Nest" we cross over the Avon by the old Clopton bridge. This is built of stone, and very old stone, too. It was the work of Sir Hugh Clopton, lord mayor of London, in the reign of King Henry the Seventh. It is 376 yards in length, and has fourteen principal arches. It is even for to-day an admirable structure. The building of a bridge like this at so early a date, shows the importance of Stratford. In 1643 the Queen of Charles the First, Henrietta Maria, having to stay in Stratford, chose New Place as her residence. She was entertained by Shakspeare's daughter for three weeks during these troublous times.

I did not have an opportunity to visit the cottage of Mary Arden at Wilmcote. Mary was the youngest daughter of Robert Arden, esquire of Warwickshire. Her marriage portion was fifty acres of arable land, six of meadow and a right of commonage, which was considerable property for that age. Her father's family must have been cultivated and well-to-do. In 1557 she married John Shakspeare. In 1564 the poet was born.

Mary Arden must have been a beautiful woman, with good blood and good brain and a happy genius. From her motherhood came the crowning glory of the human race. In the temple of her body nature breathed its divinest melody, and the "miracle of birth" revealed its most wondrous joy.

The Shakspeare day is accelerating its close to the Secular Pilgrim. The golden sunlight is over all the beautiful city; over the broad meadows and winding stream; over the stately church and loveliness of the quiet graveyard; over the lowly birth-place, and the gardens and paths of immortal love; over the sweet cottages and the embowering roses; over the forests thrilling with romance like those of Arden itself; over the Memorial building, and the Fountain, and the bright dwellings where modern luxuriance seems to drop like a jewel into the misty past and melt in the mild radiance of antiquity. Beautiful scene! and in this enchanting hour of mingling day and night, the chambers of the brain all crowded with imageries of Shakspeare, and the heart filled with unutterable emotions as the voices of the ages seem to call in tenderest music; in this resplendent evening we glide over the bosom of the river Avon. We see the fishermen along the banks; the boys in bathing; the boats sweeping past; the dimpling waters whispering to the shores. There are the willows and the rushes; the leafy beds of osiers; the mossy stone steps; the little bird on its precarious perch swaying almost to the water as it poises to take flight again; the green meadows and blue hills in the dim distance; the cattle coming to drink, or standing in the shallow water; the hedge-rows and the flowers reflected in the glassy depths; the buds of the water-lily, and the tiny water-rat plunging in and leaving a bubble or two on the placid surface; tall poplars and elms that fringe the bank, and flowers—the flowers of Shakspeare. Think of them all—the daffodils, the violets, the primroses, the cowslips, the Mary-buds, the honeysuckle, the pansies, and columbine. Do we not hear the song—

When daisies pied, and violets blue,
And lady-smocks all silver white,
And cuckoo-buds of yellow hue,
Do paint the meadows with delight.

And so, with the rhythm of the poet vibrating in the mind, and the river flowing musically along as it flowed centuries ago, when

Sweetest Shakspeare, fancy's child, Warbled his nativ wood-notes wild, dreamily we voyage the Avon while the sunset light is flushed with the emerald-hues of leaf and grass, dancing far as the eye can range to some Orphic harmony; and then our songs break forth, songs of nativ land, songs of freedom and of humanity; and from the opulent past, where man has blazoned his magnificent genius from nature's burning heat, we look into the future with hope born of a thousand years of toil, and in the splendor of Shakspeare's genius and the splendor of his nativ soil, we see all life enriched, all work made glorious, and the thought and heart of man triumphant.

More Self-Contradictions of the Bible.

I note below some "self-contradictions of the Bible," additional, I believe, to those in the two valuable printed collections THE TRUTH SEEKER has already published. They are cumulative only, and do not pretend to any novelty, but you may possibly think them worth going on record, as additional proofs that what is called inspiration does not prevent the Bible from contradicting itself in numerous instances, both as to historical facts and as to doctrinal and moral statements. If it can not be depended upon in either of these matters, what is it good for? I answer: It is a very interesting collection of historical, poetical, and theological writings, just as much inspired as Homer, Shakspeare, Bacon, Tennyson, Macaulay, or Sir John Sumner Maine.

It would be an interesting and useful undertaking to make an exhaustively complete collection of these self contradictions, and to add an account of a number of discrepancies of other kinds, such as cases of unfulfilled prophecy; contradictions on a larger scale, such as those between the whole spirit and character of Ecclesiastes, on the one hand, and Paul's Epistle to the Galatians, on the other; between the Gospel of John and the Revelation of John, etc.; obvious absurdities and impossibilities, like the doctrine of death by sin, the story of Jonah, the facts about the Exodus, the story of the serpent in Eden, the deluge story, etc.; cases of inconclusive reasoning, of which St. Paul alone furnishes enough; cases of what may be called belligerent piety, such as the quarrel between Paul and Peter; and so on. There should be added a very brief summary statement of what the Bible is and what it is not, and the quotations and subject-matter should be rearranged and well indexed. It appears to me that any truth seeker would find a good deal of healthy satisfaction for his appetite for truth in such a volume.

The following passages are not in any particular order, and some of them are additional cases similar to others already printed. If you should find these worth using, I may perhaps trouble you sometime with additional ones.

Very respectfully yours,

PRIGGLES

1. The house of Eli to walk before God forever:

I said indeed that thy house and the house of thy father should walk before me forever.—1 Sam. ii, 30.

But they are not to walk after all:

But now the Lord saith, Be it far from me . . . Behold, . . . I will cut off thine arm, and the arm of thy father's house, that there shall not be an old man in thine house . . . and all the increase of thine house shall die in the flower of their age.—1 Sam. ii, 30-33.

2. Israel and the house of David to be established forever:

Moreover I will appoint a place for my people Israel, and will plant them, that they may dwell in a place of their own, and move no more.—2 Sam. vii, 10.

None of David's seed to prosper or to rule in Judah:

Thus saith the Lord, Write ye this man [viz., Coniah or Jehoiachin] childless, a man that shall not prosper in his days; for no more of his seed shall prosper, sitting upon the throne of David, and ruling any more in Judah.—Jer. xxii, 30.

3. Ephraim shall return into Egypt:

Because Ephraim hath made many altars to sin . . . the Lord accepteth them not; . . . they shall return to Egypt.—Hos. viii, 11, 13.

Ephraim shall not return into Egypt:

He [Ephraim] shall not return into the land of Egypt, but the Assyrian shall be his king.—Hos. xi, 5.

4. Paul remained at Damascus after his vision, until he went to Jerusalem:

Then was Saul certain days with the disciples which were at Damascus.—Acts ix, 19.

But Saul . . . confounded the Jews which were at Damascus, proving that this is very Christ.—Acts ix, 22.

And when Saul was come to Jerusalem he essayed to join himself to the disciples.—Acts ix, 26.

But showed first unto them of Damascus and at Jerusalem . . . that they should repent.—Acts xxvi, 20.

Paul left Damascus at once for Arabia, and did not go to Jerusalem until three years later:

But when it pleased God to reveal his son in me . . . immediately I conferred not with flesh and blood; neither went I up to Jerusalem to them which were apostles before me; but I went into Arabia, and returned again unto Damascus. Then after three years I went up to Jerusalem.—Gal. i, 15-19.

5. Jacob's name was changed to Israel at Peniel, east of Jordan:

Thy name shall be called no more Jacob, but Israel; for as a prince hast thou power with God and man, and hast prevailed; . . . and Jacob called the name of the place Peniel.—Gen. xxxii, 28, 30.

But it was at Bethel, west of Jordan:

And God said unto him, Thy name is Jacob; thy name shall not be called any more Jacob, but Israel shall be thy name, and he called his name Israel. . . . And Jacob called the name of the place where God spake with him Beth-el.—Gen. xxxv, 10, 15.

6. The building of the temple stopped in the beginning of the reign of Artaxerxes or Ahasuerus (about B. C. 465), and resumed under Darius—as if Darius reigned after Artaxerxes:

And in the reign of Ahasuerus, in the beginning of his reign wrote they unto him an accusation against the inhabitants of Judah and Jerusalem. . . . Then ceased the work of the house of God which is at Jerusalem . . . unto the second year of the reign of Darius king of Persia.—Ezra iv, 4, 5, 6, 24.

But the temple was finished fifty years before, in the sixth year of Darius, who reigned fifty years before Artaxerxes, about B. C. 515:

And the elders of the Jews builded, . . . and this house was finished . . . in the sixth year of the reign of Darius the king.—Ezra vi, 15.

7. Noah's grandchildren and great-grandchildren spoke various languages:

The sons of Japheth, Gomer . . . and Javan . . . and the sons of Gomer . . . and the sons of Javan. . . . By these were the isles of the gentiles divided in their lands; everyone after his tongue, after their families, in their nations.—Gen. x, 2, 3, 4, 5.

(The same for the sons of Ham, Gen. x, 20; and for the sons of Shem, Gen. x, 20, 31).

At a subsequent date all men spoke the same language:

And the whole earth was of one language, and of one speech.—Gen. xi, 1.

8. Adam's first-born was Cain:

And Adam knew Eve, his wife, and she conceived, and bare Cain, and said, I have gotten a man from the Lord.—Gen. iv, 1.

Adam's first-born was Seth:

And Adam lived a hundred and thirty years, and begat a son in his own likeness, after his image; and called his name Seth.—Gen. v, 3.

9. The Lord's supper was on the day before the passover:

Now, before the feast of the passover, when Jesus knew that his hour was come . . . supper being ended . . . he riseth from supper.—John xiii, 1, 4.

The Lord's supper was on the day of the passover, viz., on the first day of the feast of unleavened bread:

Now, the first day of the feast of unleavened bread the disciples came to Jesus, saying unto him, Where wilt thou that we prepare for thee to eat the passover? And the disciples . . . made ready the passover. Now when the even was come, he sat down with the twelve.—Mat. xxvi, 17, 19, 20.

(Mark and Luke to the same effect.)

10. Solomon had peace on all sides around about him:

He [i. e., Solomon] had dominion over all across the river, from Tiphsah to Azzah, over all the kings across the river; and he had peace on all sides round about him.—1 Kings iv, 24.

He did not have peace on all sides round about him:

Rezon, the son of Eliadah . . . was an adversary to Israel all the days of Solomon, besides the mischief that Hadad did. And Jeroboam the son of Nebat . . . even he lifted up his hand against the king.—1 Kings xi, 23, 25, 26.

11. The tabernacle was in the middle of the camp of the Hebrews:

The families of the Gershonites shall pitch behind the tabernacle westward . . . The families of the sons of Kohath shall pitch on the side of the tabernacle southward. . . . The families of Merari . . . shall pitch on the side of the tabernacle northward. . . . But those that encamp before the tabernacle toward the east . . . shall be Moses, and Aaron and his sons.—Num. iii, 23, 29, 35, 38.

The tabernacle was outside the camp:

But there remained two of the men in the camp . . . and they . . . went not out unto the tabernacle, and they prophesied in the camp.—Num. vi, 26.

And the Lord spake suddenly unto Moses, and unto Aaron, and unto Miriam: Come out ye three unto the tabernacle of the congregation. And they three came out.—Num. xii, 4.

12. The ascension of Jesus was on the evening of the third day after the crucifixion:

To-day is the third day since these things were done. . . . And they rose up the same hour and returned to Jerusalem, and found the eleven gathered together. . . . And as they thus spake, Jesus himself stood in the midst of them. . . . And he led them out as far as to Bethany, and he lifted up his hands and blessed them. . . . And it came to pass, while he blessed them, he was parted from them, and carried up into heaven.—Luke xxiv, 21, 33, 36, 50, 51.

The ascension of Jesus took place forty days after the crucifixion:

He [Jesus] showed himself alive after his passion by many infallible proofs, being seen . . . forty days . . . And when he had spoken these things, while they beheld, he was taken up; and a cloud received him out of their sight.—Acts i, 3, 9.

13. John the Baptist, before his disciples, recognized Jesus, and testified to his mission:

Again the next day after, John stood, and two of his disciples, and looking upon Jesus as he walked, he saith: Behold the Lamb of God!—John i, 35, 36.

Disciples of John who knew nothing of Jesus:

And a certain Jew named Apollos . . . spake and taught diligently the things of the Lord, knowing only the baptism of John.—Acts xviii, 24, 25.

Paul . . . came to Ephesus; and finding certain disciples he saith unto them, Have ye received the Holy Ghost since ye believed? And they said unto him, We have not so much as heard whether there be any Holy Ghost. And he said unto them, Unto what were ye then baptized? And they said, Unto John's baptism. . . . They were baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus.—Acts xix, 1-5.

14. A false prophet is known by his recommending other gods than Jehovah:

If there arise among you a prophet, or a dreamer of dreams, and giveth thee a sign or a wonder, and the sign or the wonder come to pass whereof he spake unto thee, saying, Let us go after other gods which thou hast not known, and let us serve them; thou shalt not hearken unto the words of that prophet or that dreamer of dreams. . . . And that prophet, or that dreamer of dreams, shall be put to death.—Deut. xiii, 1, 2, 3, 5.

A false prophet is known by the failure of his prediction:

When a prophet speaketh in the name of the Lord, if the thing follow not, nor come to pass, that is the thing which the Lord hath not spoken, but the prophet hath spoken it presumptuously; thou shalt not be afraid of him.—Deut. xviii, 22.

15. Man to die in the day when he should eat of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil:

But of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil thou shalt not eat of it; for in the day that thou eatest thereof, thou shalt surely die.—Gen. ii, 17.

Man did not die in the day when he ate of it:

(See Gen. iii, 9-23; ending.) Therefore the Lord God sent him forth from the garden of Eden to till the ground from whence he was taken.—Gen. iii, 23.

16. Jesus taught to love our enemies and do good to them that hate us:

But I say, Love your enemies, do good to them which hate you, bless them which curse you, and pray for them which despitefully use you.—Luke vi, 27, 28.

Paul contradicts Jesus, and says our enemies ought to be made to smart for it:

Alexander the coppersmith did me much evil; the Lord reward him according to his works.—2 Tim. iv, 14. Seeing it is a righteous thing with God to recompense tribulation to them which trouble you.—2 Thess. i, 6.

17. Jesus promises the apostles high positions in the next world:

And Jesus said unto them, Verily I say unto you, that ye which have followed me, in the regeneration when the son of man shall sit upon the throne of his glory, ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel.—Mat. xix, 28.

Jesus had no authority to give the apostles high positions in the next world:

Then came to him the mother of Zebedee's children. . . . She saith unto him, Grant that these, my two sons, may sit, the one on thy right hand, and the other on the left, in thy kingdom. But Jesus answered and said, . . . to sit on my right hand and on my left, is not mine to give.—Mat. xx, 20, 21, 22, 23.

18. None but Jesus Christ has immortality.

Our Lord Jesus . . . who only hath immortality.—1 Tim. vi, 14-16.

All the redeemed have immortality:

. . . This mortal must put on immortality. So when . . . this mortal shall have put on immortality, then shall be brought to pass the saying which is written, Death is swallowed up in victory.—1 Cor. xv, 53-4.

19. Paul is referred to men for instructions in his missionary work:

And I said, What shall I do, Lord? And the Lord said unto me, Arise, and go into Damascus; and there it shall be told thee of all things which are appointed for thee to do.—Acts xxii, 10.

Paul's commission given him on the spot:

. . . I [i. e., Jesus] have appeared unto thee for this purpose, . . . delivering thee from the people, and from the Gentiles, unto whom now I send thee.—Acts xxvi, 15-18.

20. Jesus intended his gospel for the Jews only:

Go not into the way of the gentile, and into any city of the Samaritans enter ye not; but go rather to the lost sheep of the house of Israel.—Mat. x, 5, 6.

I am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel.—Mat. xv, 24.

This day is salvation come to this house, for so much as he also is a son of Abraham.—Luke xix, 9.

Salvation is of the Jews.—John iv, 22.

Paul and Peter contradict Jesus, and say the gospel is for the gentiles also.

Of a truth I [i. e., Peter] perceive that God is no respecter of persons; but in every nation he that feareth him, and worketh righteousness, is accepted with him.—Acts x, 34.

Then hath God also to the gentiles granted repentance unto life.—Acts xi, 18.

That I [i. e., Paul] should be the minister of Jesus Christ to the gentiles, ministering the gospel of God, that the offering up of the gentiles might be acceptable, being sanctified by the Holy Ghost.—Rom. xv, 16.

21. We should love even our enemies:

But I say unto you, Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, pray for them which despitefully use you and persecute you . . . for if ye love them which love you, what reward have ye? do not even the publicans the same?—Mat. v, 43; and see also, Luke vi, 28; x, 27; xxiii, 34.

St. John thinks Jesus thought it quite enough to love our fellow Christians:

Now when Jesus knew that his hour was come . . . having loved his own which were in the world, he loved them unto the end.—John xiii, 1.

By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one to another.—John xiii, 35.

This is my commandment, That ye love one another, as I have loved you.—John xv, 12.

Our Missionary Work.

Several of our good friends have written us that in their opinion the work, "Self Contradictions of the Bible," should go along with Paine's "Age of Reason" as a missionary pamphlet. Mr. J. R. Perry puts it thus: "As a missionary document the 144 Self Contradictions will go hand in hand with the 'Age of Reason.' I think any person getting the one will get the other. It is the grubbing process, clearing out the roots and stones, necessary to preparing the soil for good seeds of common sense." And as it is our delight to furnish the implements for this sort of agricultural operations, we are willing to do our part and will send the "Self Contradictions of the Bible" to those who will distribute it among their Christian friends, FOR A DOLLAR A DOZEN. Or we will send twelve copies to as many different addresses for one dollar.

Now let the friends of Freethought turn to and circulate "Self Contradictions" as well as the "Age of Reason." Send both books out by the thousand and watch the result. Flood the country with them, and let the Christians know what their holy paper fetich, the Bible, is like and why it is worthless as a guide to any good.

THE TRUTH SEEKER's offer to send eight copies of Paine's "Age of Reason" to eight different addresses for $1, to be used for missionary purposes, is still open. The best results are reported from this method of reaching intelligent believers and giving a new direction to their thoughts.

Observations.

In 1778 or thereabouts a "paper of characterizations of prominent Americans" was prepared for the guidance of the British Commissioners of Conciliation, which paper, it is reported, is now appearing in facsimile, edited by Mr. B. F. Stevens. I have not seen any of the characterizations except one reprinted by a religious journal, apparently having reference to Thomas Paine. It is as follows:

Mr. Payne—The Editor & part author of Common Sense, should not be forgot. He is an English man, was a School-master in Philada must be driven to work—naturally indolent—and led by His passions.

It is a misfortune that the identity of the author of this "characterization" is hidden from posterity. We would like to put something green on his grave. He must have been a perfect psychometer, and perhaps a reader of the stars, rather than of current literature, which would account for his knowing so much more about Paine's editorial labors than anybody else does, and so much more about his disposition than about the spelling of his name. But he is guilty of other omissions quite as serious as that of neglecting to affix his signature. In addition to the intelligence that "Mr. Payne" was "part author" of Common Sense, he might have told us what mute inglorious Milton wrote the rest of the book. The statement that Paine must be driven to work and that he was led by his passions probably left the commissioners in doubt whether the best way of imparting activity to the subject was to get behind him and push or to incite him from the front. Then, again, having been previously assured that he was "naturally indolent," they must have been more or less surprised at the pernicious activity Paine displayed some years later in their own country, when nothing in particular had occurred to stir him up. In fact, taking another look at their correspondent's sketch of "Mr. Payne," they could have remarked with propriety that the late School-master of Philada might as well have been "forgot" as described in so misleading a manner.

In the Far West I have heard residents speak of planting people—generally just after some unpleasantness had occurred—but regarded it as a form of expression not sanctioned by the best usage. It is scripture nevertheless, as appears from 2 Samuel vii, 10, where the author remarks: "Moreover I will appoint a place for my people Israel, and will plant them."

The Union Printer and American Craftsman does not wish to be understood as holding any opinion which, if known to a paying subscriber, would cause him to discontinue, but it declares nevertheless:

We are bound to admit that while a large number of the inhabitants of this country feel that they should drink more or less liquor on Sunday, it is not in keeping with the great American principles of freedom to deny them that right.

With reference to this, and without pointing out that "a large number" has no relevancy to the question of rights, the Voice (Prohibition and Agglomerate) observes:

So far as we know, no one proposes to deny them that right. Does the law that closes the bakeries on Sunday deny the right of men and women to eat bread that day? Get the mists out of your mind, brother? It is the traffic, not the personal act of drinking, that is being interfered with, and to abolish all laws that stop Sunday traffic means a week of seven work-days. Do you like to contemplate that?

John Stuart Mill held that you might as well deny a right as to make its exercise impossible; but Mill was a man who could think twice, while the editor of the Voice has not that power. The Sunday suppression of liquor selling has two objects in view—to prevent drinking and to preserve the sanctity of the day. If the prohibition-Sabbatarians could do it, they would penetrate into private houses as they do into private club rooms. They will deny this, though I don't see why they should. The place where a man wants to drink is the place where he happens to be dry, and the liquor suppressors, like other burglars and garroters, have as clear a right to operate in one spot as another. If I am in Harlem and want a glass of beer, the sneaks and spies will give me less annoyance by invading my premises at that particular moment than by closing the uptown hosteleries.

I have got through claiming any right whatsoever for the untravelling citizen, and won't assert that a man has the right to buy or sell liquor or bread on Sunday or any other day of the week. I leave it to the trespassers to demonstrate their right to prevent him: declining to have the burden of proof thrust upon me in a discussion which I have not provoked.

It may be admitted that "to abolish all laws that stop Sunday traffic means a week of seven work-days," but what of that? We have a week of six work-days now, and the laborer who gets in five days' work a week is in luck. From the number of idle workmen who apply at this office for employment, I infer that the opportunity to earn an honest dollar on Sunday would not be deemed a misfortune. The seven work-days in a week ghost is a Sabbatarian scarecrow.

Making a transparent bluff at argument, the Voice asks: "Does the law that closes the bakeries on Sunday deny the right of men and women to eat bread that day?" Deny them the right to eat bread! Why, you abominable thief and assassin of liberty, it denies them the bread itself. You would kill a man by law, and then assure his friends that his right to life had not been denied—if he could get it.

A theological writer tells us that "God is to be conceived of as in law." Taken along with the theory that the personage spoken of is the author of our being, we are furnished with a father-in-law not previously recognized as such. Prose is inadequate to the occasion.

We find in our singular system of faith
The queerest phenomena man ever saw,
For though we divide on the feminine side,
Yet all of us have the same father-in-law.

There's Mary, the spouse and the mother of God,
The same by the Holy Ghost being enticed,
Which was also her son, called the crucified one,
And the God and the Ghost and the Son were the Christ.

Now Christ, being God, was the father, of course
(For God, we are told, is the sire of all flesh),
Of Mary his mother, and likewise her brother
And husband—which rouses our wonder afresh.

The Father to Mary was husband and son,
For never was tale with such mystery rife;
And the Ghost to his bosom—how could he confuse 'em?—
Took mother and daughter and sister and wife!

Such being the scandalous facts in the case,
The thought of relationship sticks in my craw;
And so if Jehovah will pass the thing over
I'll not urge his duties as father-in-law.

We are called upon to go back to first principles for the solution of the social purity problem. For many joyous centuries, whenever a man and a woman disregarded the limitations which custom placed upon social intercourse, it was submitted without argument that the female had been the beguiler. We all remember that after Christ dismissed the case against the woman caught sinning, the attorneys for the mob wasted no breath inquiring what should be done with the co-respondent. There was no precedent to go upon in doing so. In these degenerate days, however, there has been an observable tendency to charge the male with equal turpitude, or in fact greater, since it hath been speciously argued that, in order to avoid misdoing, the woman must both disregard her own inclinations or necessities and resist the solicitations of the man; and we have sympathized with her almost as heartily as we have denounced the wickedness of the villain who pursued her. But there is promise of a reversion to the previous system, and the Rev. W. J. Ward, a chaplain in the service of her majesty the queen of Great Britain, stalks boldly forth to the vindication of men. In a religious publication he discusses the matter, and having premised that "to find the true remedy we must go back to the root" (I quote his language), he discovers that in the case of women unchastity proceeds from desire, from passion, or from voluptuousness. "But in the case of men" (I quote again), "it is not passion." He italicizes the words "it is not passion," and adds:

In most cases it is the women who tempt and the men who are tempted.

There you have it, sisters, right from one of the disinterested sex. Now will you social innovators of the Lucifer family, you woman's rights agitators and new women—will you let up on us? Our engagement as heavy villains in the social drama has expired.

Considering the impossibility of any person but a fool believing the yarn with which Moses accompanied the delivery of the Ten Commandments, it is not at all strange that the Israelites should have found among them no prohibition of ordinary and miscellaneous lying. But the omission was not a very material one, because the introduction of the thunder and lightning display has been the inspiration of more bald untruth than such a commandment would have prevented if it had been the first of the ten.

Thunder and lightning are and always were useful as decorations for an otherwise unattractive lie, and they have been so used ever since the Decalog was promulgated, while the numerous electrocutions of blasphemers by the Almighty may perhaps have suggested the use of the electric chair. The thunder and lightning lie always has a theological allusion, and, to make things even, nearly every theological truth has so close a resemblance to a lie that an uninspired person can hardly distinguish one from the other. Now, here is a story from Sullivan county, this state, that needs only to be told in scriptural language to make it true as the gospel.

Be it known, then, that twelve years ago Hiram Hornbeck, the prodigal son of this narrative, left his home in Neversink, N. Y., and went West. Whether he was ever reduced to standing in with swine for a husk lunch the account does not state, but last week he walked back penitent and hungry. Shortly after his arrival at his father's place a shower came up, during which lightning struck a calf in the barnyard, and the same bolt, entering the house, laid open the family Bible at the fifteenth chapter of Luke, and made a black mark opposite the twenty-third verse, which reads: "And bring hither the fattest calf and kill it; and let us eat and be merry."

The foregoing circumstance is related in the New York Sun of August 11, with no comment except the heading, which is: "Psalms cxvi. Evidence from Sullivan county that David wasn't so hasty." The verse cited is as follows: "I said in my haste, All men are liars." The rural congregation, the Sunday-school, and finally the heathen will get the story, with others from which it is copied, without the benefit of the Sun's reference and David's commentary.

Witchcraft.

From the London Freethinker.

The trial of Irish peasants for burning Bridget Cleary as a witch should bring home to everyone the horrible character of this Bible superstition. There is every appearance that ignorance and superstition are alone to blame for the atrocity. Had the accused persons believed that the poor woman was really herself, and not in the possession of some evil spirit, they would never have thought of injuring her. Under such circumstances, it seems as if to condemn to death the victims of ignorance and superstition is but to add a legal atrocity to that already perpetrated. What is needed is, that such instruction shall be given as shall remove the causes of superstition. These causes are to be found in the popular religion. The belief in witchcraft is a legitimate and logical outcome of that religion, and it may be doubted if it will be wholly extirpated while that retains unquestioning belief.

The delusion of witchcraft is the natural result of a religion that rests on terrorism, for, as Lecky remarks, the panic which its teachings create overbalance the faculties of the multitude. The belief in a devil who is the head of an organized kingdom of evil spirits (Mat. xii, 24-26), and who goes about seeking whom he may devour, contains in itself the essence of witchcraft. The theory is founded on, and supported by, the Bible, as I have fully shown in my recent pamphlet on "Satan, Witchcraft, and the Bible." Fear is at the foundation of all religion. One of its chief manifestations is fear of the dead, fear that they may return to plague the living, and the belief that all hurtful phenomena are the result of such action by evil spirits. Animism, the belief in spirits, is, in the words of the renowned anthropologist, Dr. E. B. Tylor, the groundwork of the philosophy of religion, from that of savages up to that of civilized man.

In his article on "Demonology," in the Encyclopædia Britannica, Dr. Tylor says: "No record shows the ancient theory more clearly than the New Testament, from the explicit way in which the symptoms of the various affections are described, culminating in the patient declaring the name of his possessing demon, and answering in his person when addressed. The similarity of the symptoms with those which in barbarous countries are still accounted for in the ancient way may be seen from such statements as the following by a well-known missionary (Rev. J. L. Wilson, "Western Africa," p. 217): "Demoniacal possessions are common, and the feats performed by those who are supposed to be under such influence are certainly not unlike those described in the New Testament. Frantic gestures, convulsions, foaming at the mouth, feats of supernatural strength, furious ravings, bodily lacerations, gnashing of teeth, and other things of a similar character may be witnessed in most of the cases." "Among the early Christians," continues Dr. Tylor, "the demoniacs or energumens formed a special class under the control of a clerical order of exorcists; and a mass of evidence drawn from such writers as Cyril, Tertullian, Chrysostom, and Minutius Felix shows that the symptoms of those possessed were such as modern physicians would class under hysteria, epilepsy, lunacy, etc." (See their works and references in Bingham, "Antiquities of the Christian Church; Maury, "La Magic et l'Astrologie," part ii., chap. ii., etc.)

Though the belief in sorcery has existed from the earliest times, its palmiest days were those of credulous Christianity. Sorcery and saints, miracles and magic, grew and flourished together. If unanimity could turn fancy into fact, witchcraft was a stern reality. Divided on so many other points, here Christians were at one. Possession by devils, one of the chief features of the gospels, gave occasion for the display of that prime token of orthodoxy, the power of exorcism. So the thunders of the Vatican against witchcraft were re-echoed from Lambeth and Geneva. Indeed, the spread of the Bible in the sixteenth century vastly contributed to the renewed persecution of alleged witches. The Puritan was as bad as the Inquisitor, and in godly Scotland and pious New England some of the latest and most horrid atrocities took place. The men of God constantly preached about the devil and his agencies of evil, and, as a consequence, nervous terrors of witchcraft abounded. The accusation was, moreover, a specious plea for getting rid of all sorts of objectionable people. The witches of the Middle Ages were but the votaries of the ancient proscribed religion. There is abundant evidence that Paganism survived in Europe until close upon the time of the Reformation. The witches' Sabbaths were the orgies of Sabazios, a development of Dionysius or Bacchus. In stamping out witchcraft the church was really suppressing the remnants of a rival faith. The charge was afterwards leveled at heretics, political and religious opponents, and was also a means of extracting the property of the wealthy. Mr. James Russell Lowell, in his essay on "Witchcraft" ("Among My Books," First Series, p. 128), remarks:

I have already said that it was religious antipathy or clerical interest that first made heresy and witchcraft identical, and cast them into the same exorcist fire. The invention was a Catholic one, but it is plain that Protestants soon learned its value, and were not slow in making it a plague to the inventor. It was not till after the Reformation that there was any systematic hunting out of witches in England. Then, no doubt, the innocent charms and rhyming prayers of the old religion were regarded as incantations and twisted-out evidence against miserable beldames who mumbled over in their dotage what they had learned at their mother's knee.

It has been computed that the witchcraft mania cost the lives of over nine millions of people, mostly women. The Bible text, "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to live" (Ex. xxii, 18), has truly been written in blood and fire.

The case in Tipperary may, in some measure, enable us to realize the horrors connected with this scripture-warranted belief. We may be sure, however, that all the cruelties inflicted by witch-torturers were thrown into the background by the inner agony of those victims of credulity and hysteria who were looked on as sold to the devil, and who often themselves believed that they had entered unwittingly into a contract whereby they would be eternally lost. Mr. Lecky, in an eloquent passage, points out that no class of victims endured sufferings so unalloyed and intense.

Not for them the wild fanaticism that nerves the soul against danger, and almost steels the body against torments. Not for them the assurance of a glorious eternity, that has made the martyr look with exultation on the rising flame as on the Elijah's chariot that is to bear his soul to heaven. Not for them the solace of lamenting friends, or the consciousness that their memories would be cherished and honored by posterity. They died alone, hated and unpitied. They were deemed by all mankind the worst of criminals. Their very kinsmen shrank from them as tainted and accursed. The superstitions they had imbibed in childhood, blending with the illusions of age, and with the horrors of their position, persuaded them in many cases that they were indeed the bond slaves of Satan, and were about to exchange their torments on earth for an agony that was as excruciating, and was as eternal.

How was it that men could, without pity or compunction, see their fellows writhing amidst blazing fagots for an imaginary crime? The case of Bridget Cleary helps us to see that it was their religious belief, their Bible-supported superstition, which made them regard these as agents of an evil spirit. Is it not an anomaly that a government which authorizes the Bible as the word of God should yet try for the crime of murder, and perhaps condemn to death, the poor fanatics whom it has left in ignorance, and who read in the Bible the awful words "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to live"?

J. M. WHEELER.

*Michael Cleary, the husband of Bridget, was sentenced to twenty years penal servitude, and several of his fellow torturers to shorter terms.

Letters of Friends.

They Are After the Book.

GOSHEN, N. Y., Aug. 8, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I have made up my mind to send $3 for THE TRUTH SEEKER for one year and the "Pictorial Text-Book."

SOREN CH. NICOLAISON.

FAIRMONT, NEB., July 26, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $5, for which send me THE TRUTH SEEKER and the "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book," Paine's "Theological Works," and the pamphlets named. JAMES HOLMES.

MITCHELL, S. DAK., Aug. 3, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $3, for which please send THE TRUTH SEEKER for one year and the "Pictorial Text-Book." THE TRUTH SEEKER is just the paper I have been looking for. Will you please tell me of some cheap tracts that will start a person to thinking? Wishing you success in your good work, I am and remain, Yours truly, CHAS. WELLER.

[A list of cheap tracts is found in our advertising columns. We strongly recommend their purchase and distribution.—ED. T. S.]

FOND DU LAC, WIS., Aug. 3, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $6—$3 of which is furnished by a new subscriber, and to him you may send the "Pictorial Text-Book"—and $3 to pay my subscription to Feb. 5, 1896. Mr. Frederick A. Binney has been telling in the Twentieth Century why we have to work and wait so long to get a subscriber. Had the greenback been made a full legal tender it would have remained at par with gold, and had not the government changed $1,400,000 into bonds no resumption would have worried us; and now, the Democratic and Republican ships being united (they may sink), I hope we may have a change in legislation, and out loose from redemption for money and the human family.

Yours truly, DE W. C. PRIEST.

A Generous Friend.

PARIS, ILL., July 28, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $5 to pay for the paper this year. Send me one of the last edition of the "Crimes of Preachers" and the ANNUAL, and the balance I give you.

Yours, J. CRETORS.

For Two Books and Paper.

MT. CLEMENS, MICH., Aug. 6, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: As it is about time to renew, you will find inclosed $6—$4.50 of it for THE TRUTH SEEKER and premium, the "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book," and the other $1.50 for "Antiquity Unveiled."

Respectfully, COPLEY COTTRELL.

Sound Doctrin.

NEW YORK, Aug. 6, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: The "great Boston love feast," set forth by John Peck in last week's TRUTH SEEKER, calls for serious thought, especially that part wherein he says: "Let the American people never forget that Christianity is a species of insanity, and those who would put the destiny of the government into Christian hands would place their fortunes in the keeping of lunatics." That is sound doctrine, worthy of consideration.

S. R. THORNE.

He Keeps It Traveling.

XENIA, O., July 30, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: My "Old Testament Story Book" has been doing missionary work in this city for about a year; it is now in Dayton, O., in the same business, and more than likely I will never see it again. I would not be without one if it cost ten dollars, so I take advantage of your very liberal offer by inclosing $5 for which please send "Old Testament Stories Comically Illustrated," "All About the Holy Bible," "Age of Reason," and renew THE TRUTH SEEKER for another year.

Yours, etc., HENRY FISHERING.

Back Numbers Brought Him Back.

CEDRON, KAN., Aug. 1, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Last year I was a subscriber to your paper, the most welcome publication that ever made weekly visits to my home, and as God, in his infinite goodness, saw fit to withdraw from this country, and leave us to the mercy of the hot winds and chinch bugs for the last three years, I felt compelled to stop the paper. Being without any good reading matter, I picked up some old numbers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and they persuaded me to re-subscribe. Inclosed find 50 cents, which will insure me THE TRUTH SEEKER to the full value of the amount paid, at the expiration of which time my post-office address will be somewhere else I think.

We have some men with us who are moderately liberal thinkers when talking with a Freethinker, but would rather the Christians would not know too much about it. They can call me Infidel, Agnostic, Heretic, or anything that suits them best, but I want the grand old TRUTH SEEKER to aid me in battling for liberty. I am not a very successful worker, but "Little drops of water

Make the mighty sea."

Respectfully, J. S. OGDEN,

A Small but Active Society.

ROCKEYVILLE, S. D., Aug. 1, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I send $1 for cheap tracts. Another member of our society and myself thought we would send for this small list, examine it, and see if we could get good people and children to read them; if only small success attends our efforts at first we will be satisfied and order more largely in the near future.

We find the greatest difficulty in talking to the average Christian is his or her profound ignorance of the Bible and its teachings; in arguments with them we call their attention to some pernicious or obscene passage or chapter, and they generally deny all knowledge of it and say it is not in the Bible. We also encounter difficulty in reaching those who do not belong to any church. On those questions they appear to be asleep. They seem to have a horror of any mental exertion.

We have organized a society here and named it "The Search-Light." We have only three members as yet; we meet once a week.

We are taking your most excellent paper on three months trial; we like it so well we will continue to take it. Wishing you the greatest success, I subscribe myself,

Yours truly, JOHN C. CARTER.

Who Wants a Bookkeeper?

MILLERSBURG, O., July 22, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $4—$3 for the renewal of my subscription and $1 for the Wise case in Kansas. I would willingly give more if I had the money, but the times are so hard here that a person can hardly get a cent to lay on top of another, and besides I have just got through paying for my son's training in a business college, and that took about all the money I had.

If a membership in THE TRUTH SEEKER family entitles me to any privilege, or if I would not impose too much on your good nature, dear Editor, I would like to ask if any one of your readers is in need of a bookkeeper or assistant bookkeeper. I would be glad if they would give my son a trial. He is a boy twenty-two years of age, and of good, steady habits. He can furnish the best of references to be had in Millersburg, and, for further reference, he is the author of the picture in the "Pictorial Text-Book," where a saint is pulling another cheap soul out of purgatory. His name is in the center of the picture.

Wishing success to you and all the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, I remain, sincerely yours,

JOHN CHEVALLARD.

Not Afraid of Discussion.

EAST OTTO, N. Y., Aug. 5, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $6.50 for the renewal of my subscription to the grand old TRUTH SEEKER and "Four Hundred Years of Freethought." Your paper is like an old friend, I have taken it so long.

"News and Notes," from Putnam, are very interesting. I never fail to read "Letters from Friends." If some of them do write against Spiritualism, all right. If independent slate writing can be accounted for scientifically, or some other way, I shall continue to take THE TRUTH SEEKER just the same. I like to have both sides of a question discussed. If someone wrote upon the money question, or any other interesting subject, I think the reputation of your paper would not be injured.

I was a Sunday-school student in the Methodist Episcopal church when a boy, and became a convert in one of their revivals at the age of twelve. I began reading the Bible as any other book, and soon found some very large stories. When I asked my father how they could be true, he tried to satisfy me by saying they were miracles. After reading it through I was spoiled for a Christian. I am now over sixty, and am done believing in gods, devils, and hells, except those we make ourselves.

C. BURCHARD.

A Convert's "Testimony."

LYONS, KAN., July 25, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Through the kindness of one of your subscribers of this place I have been reading a few copies of your valuable paper. I hope to soon become a subscriber. We are trying to get up a subscription club here. Thinking that perhaps a history of my conversion to Freethought might interest your readers, I will endeavor to give you a brief synopsis of the case. To quote Shakspeare, "that which has most sapped" my belief in the Bible was my ignorance. I joined the church when I was a child because others were joining. I said that I believed Jesus Christ was the son of God because I was requested to do so. When I became older, and began to read the Bible, to think and reason for myself, I said I did not believe all of it, such as the Witch of Endor calling Samuel up, and other absurdities. Realizing that by this statement I invalidated the whole, a Freethinker gave me a copy of "The Genealogy of Christ," by Stout. Well, I read it carefully, hunted up the evidence, found that it was just as it was stated in the so-called Holy Bible. I hid the book away, but could not hide the impression it had made on my mind. I resolved to never read it again, for I wanted to believe in part of the Bible, at least. But my conscience troubled me for professing to believe what I didn't believe. I attended a revival meeting. The preacher had a great deal to say about the "Age of Reason." He hurled maledictions at Ingersoll and Remsburg, the second of whom he designated as "the smaller fry." I became more and more disgusted with the false reasoning of the theologians. I made up my mind to procure the "Age of Reason." "No, we do not keep such books," was the haughty reply received from the booksellers. I sent away for it. I read it. I expect to continue reading it until I have absorbed all its contents. To me it is the book of books. Well, made I up my mind that I could no longer be honest and call myself a Christian. So here I am, a convert to Freethought, and if I have lost friends I have gained a clear conscience.

It was with pleasure that I read a letter from J. E. Remsburg to THE TRUTH SEEKER lately. I used to be acquainted with him in Atchison county. If this catches his eye he will remember. I am proud of having once known him. Also to know that he is having great success as a Freethought lecturer. Also that said "smaller fry" has distinguished himself as an author.

ROWENA GUERIN.

Those Two Genealogies.

WEST SALEM, ILL., July 26, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I notice an article from one of your readers in regard to the genealogy of Christ as given by Matthew and Luke. Now I think Mr. Paine in his "Age of Reason" has made a mistake. He says in his remarks on this subject, in Part II.: "There are only the two names of David and Joseph alike in the two lists." Now this is not true, for in his own diagram of Matthew and Luke's lists I find in Matthew's list, Nos. 12 and 13, the names, Zorobabel and Salathiel, and in Luke's list, Nos. 21 and 22, I find the same names Zorobabel and Salathiel. This shows that Mr. Paine did not observe the names very closely. It is very likely that both lists are true ones, as I will proceed to explain.

Matthew gives Jesus's genealogy through Joseph, and Luke gives that which is by Mary. In Jewish genealogy the women were not reckoned, but the husbands of the women were used instead. Thus Joseph was the son of Jacob by birth and the son of Heli by the law of marriage, or, as we would say, the son of Jacob and the son-in-law of Heli.

If you will read closely you will notice that Matthew in his genealogy uses the word "begat," meaning that each person was naturally begotten and a son by birth, while Luke in his genealogy does not use the specific term "begat," but says "the son of," meaning a son either by birth or by the law of marriage. According to the reckoning of the Jews, either way did not invalidate the genealogical right of Jesus to the claim of the messiah. As to the difference in the number of names given, I believe Matthew omitted several and perhaps Luke omitted a few, but if either did, Matthew omitted the greater number. But as every lawyer knows "omission is not contradiction," it does not invalidate their claim to truth. I admit that they should have given them all, without any omission of names, but it seems that they did not. If I should give my genealogy and omit my great-grandfather's name from the list, would that prove me untruthful?

The Jews, I understand, are still expecting the messiah, but if a claimant should appear at this or any future time how could he establish his claims by genealogy? Are not the genealogical records of the Jews totally destroyed and forever lost? This ought to be an unanswerable and convincing argument against their expectations of a future messiah.

Now, if I am mistaken in any of my statements, or if I am correct, will you please give it a hearing in the next issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and oblige

Yours for the truth, ED. FULLER.

Science vs. Religion.

FILLMORE, ILL., July 30, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $3, for which you may continue THE TRUTH SEEKER. I have been taking your paper for about two months, and I like its pages above all I ever read.

We had a debate recently at this place, and I inclose to you my short talk, which speaks my sentiments straight from the shoulder.

Ladies and Gentlemen: Man's natural state of existence is a puzzle to every creature upon the entire planet—one is not superior nor inferior, more wise or less ignorant than anyone else in this regard. Man is man, woman is woman, and, according to the Bible, is made in the image of God. According to the Bible, God is a "true," a "righteous," an "ever-living," and an "unchangeable" God, and if we are images of him we must likewise possess the same characteristics; if he is true, we must all be true; if he is righteous, we are made by him in his own image. I cannot see wherein his supposed law of religion has advanced civilization, strengthened intellect, made happy homes, protected virtue, fostered liberty, or in any other way had any tendency to fit us to live even in this world, let alone entering his beautiful heaven.

Right here is something that I can't believe, and I can't help it, and I don't believe that God will damn me for this failure to believe. It is a fact that religion has always assassinated the liberties of man. When the government of the United States of America was founded, liberty spoke emphatically and said on the Fourth day of July, 1776: "This government shall be founded upon free principles, with equal liberty for all American citizens, and there shall be no interference with religious freedom." And I dare say that the measure of liberty we possess is the fruit of science and Freethought, not of religion. I wish to say to you that I cannot believe that religion has elevated mankind more than has science, and I doubt if there is a sane man in the audience to-night who believes or can believe that it has.

Science leads in the civilization of this vast country. Science has weakened superstition, has supplanted savagery, and has built the beautiful cities and towns in every state of the Union; it has connected them by railroads, telegraphs, and telephones, placing us in direct communication with our fellow beings all over the land; has built the steamship by which we are enabled to visit the other parts of the world, and has laid the cable under the waters of the seas, thus connecting us with the other nations of the earth. On the other hand, the subjects of religion have infringed upon the rights of man, and have demanded privileges that were granted against the better judgment of the lawmakers in the different states, at the behest of majorities or supposed majorities. The Sunday law, which is faster and faster encroaching upon the liberties of man, is a gross injustice to the people in general, and is not at all in harmony with the Constitution, which was framed by the noble Thomas Jefferson, a firm believer in science and liberty instead of superstition and religion. Religion has wrecked the minds and covered the world with the blood of its own followers.

Friends, all that I have asserted can be easily proved, and viewing all without prejudice I cannot see wherein religion has elevated or civilized mankind. Science is the only reformer of man, as truth has taught us. Science is the promoter of civilization.

He Thinks Spiritualism is Growing.

CHICAGO, Aug. 6, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: After a four months' trip in the West I return home to read a communication in your valuable paper of July 13th from C. Severance, which accuses me of bigotry and intolerance, for which, if true, I am certainly sorry. I will plead no excuse, but ask the correspondent to please read the many belittling terms used by Materialists who seek to ignore the idea that it is possible for others to know anything but the teachings of the past, which has known nothing but rank or gross Materialism, or of matter capable of being seen, tasted, smelled, and kicked into an infinity of shapes, and the life teetotally knocked out of it. I, of all men, intend to speak respectfully of the opinion of others, and would not do one good Christian act, such as to burn a Materialistic heretic at the stake, but would say, "first investigate to find the truth and afterward divine the cause."

So far as the claim that the question of "spirit phenomena has been settled by all scientists," I do not so claim, but to the contrary, yet, if it is true, as C. Severance says, that "among highly educated people the belief in a continuance of consciousness after death has visibly weakened during the present century," it neither proves nor disproves anything, and when we see five millions of Spiritualists in the United States who claim to have proof positive, evidence (not belief) to support their belief, it really proves nothing to unbelievers, for we see twenty million communicants in the Christian churches in our own country, and yet I fail to believe that one word of the Book is divine and comes direct from God.

Neither does the condemnation of Spiritualism by science disprove its claims, for science deals mostly with physical and not so much with the metaphysical, or with the real as recognized by our five senses, and not with the more sublime or refined matter, as understood by Spiritualists. I certainly have the right to claim bigotry when I see those who know absolutely nothing of the phenomena of Spiritism condemning it in positiv terms, although the door is ajar for them to enter in and investigate.

"It is an exhausted subject," says your correspondent, showing how little he knows of the great advancement made in the last few years in Spiritualism, which is much more than the progress made in science; and who would think of saying that science is an exhausted subject? The facts are that both are in their infancy and must go hand in hand. How long has it been since hypnotism and other demonstrations of the psychic law have been a subject of investigation, except in the East, where the subject of return of sub-consciousness, or spirit intelligence, has been known for centuries? No one claims that Spiritism, or transference of thought in some form, is of new birth.

Occultism may have discovered all there is to learn of the cause and demonstration of the forces, but I think not. "We face the grave to-day with no absolute knowledge that consciousness extends beyond it for any human being." This may be true to some, but not for all, and to me is erroneous, for while I have never been dead and again returned to uncorrupted flesh, that I know of, yet I have intelligent communications from some unknown source that compel me to accept spirit return, unless I shall find the communications to come from some other source.

When I see in several states a human form impersonating my deceased daughter, of the same size, feature, and conversation, come from out the floor, from behind the audience (not from the cabinet), come to me, kiss me, and tell me of all my friends, both alive and deceased, besides many whom I had nearly forgotten, what am I to think? Slates by the score, that I take to a medium, and which never leave my hands or eye-sight, on which I obtain the most intelligent communications in many colors, in answer to my mental questions, also flowers in colors that I could distinctly hear the marking of pencil when being drawn (without pencil being placed between the slates)—when I see and hear all this, what shall I say? Please don't cry "hypnotized," "psychologized," or fool-sized, but learn the truth for yourself.

Of all things essential for a periodical to make it a "Truth Seeker," is to open its columns for free discussion, for it is by an honest exchange of thought that we grow intellectually.

Allow me to add that I am as much of a Materialist as ever, believing that nothing exists but matter and its accompanying entity or soul-life in correlation, behind which, and in which, is God, nature, and creation.

A. D. SWAN.

Unbelievers and Our Friend Judas.

LOS ANGELES, CAL., July 14, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: It has always been a mystery to me why people will persist in going to hell through unbelief, and it pained me much when I saw in his communication that Mr. Billings, of Texas, was headed that way. We are told so clearly in the revised New Testament the fate of unbelievers, that all who go to hell must do so wilfully, or as the result of a contumacious spirit; for the warning is expressed, as you well know, in these words: "He that believeth and is properly irrigated shall be saved, but he that believeth not shall be damned." Now, what are we expected to believe? We are expected to believe the so-called word of God in its entirety, and are not supposed to reject any part of it simply because it does not agree with our ideas of justice, right, and common sense. "God's ways are not our ways," and we must bear this fact in mind when we read his word, as now revised, or as it may be later on. What God says goes. Let that be understood, for, considering the crowded population of hell, it is high time people stopped doubting, and began to believe. Mr. Billings talks about the heathen ideas of what is called orthodoxy, and reveals the fact that the doctrines put forth by Universalists and Unitarians are in accord with his views. Allow me to correct him, and possibly, while doing so, to insure the salvation of his never-dying soul. It is wrong and absurd to connect orthodox doctrines with heathen ideas, for the heathen never believed in an endless hell and eternal torments? Those tidings of great joy were first given to the world by our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, and nothing in the Bible is more clearly taught than the endless damnation of the wicked, who, when properly defined, are the unbelievers that have neglected to be irrigated in the manner desired by God, which is complete immersion, as I positively know, for a Baptist clergyman once told me so, and quoted scripture in evidence. In the two sects quoted by Mr. Billings we see private judgment run mad, and we behold the awful danger which attends the reading of the scriptures when mortal man presumes to shape God's ideas to fit his individual theories of right and equity. We must believe as commanded, and not reject the very foundation of Christianity—an endless hell, from which Jesus Christ came to save sinner—if we profess to be Christians. If there be no hell, then the crucifixion of Jesus was an unnecessary event, and God had no occasion to concoct a scheme which embodied immaculate conception and the resurrection, with all the intermediary acts that occurred. If we are going to endanger our souls with unbelief, let us reject the whole business, and not try to make out, as do the Universalists and Unitarians, that Jesus was simply a good man with moral ideas that would benefit the world if adopted, for, when we go that far, we become what those sects have been so aptly termed—"whitewashed Infidels." Orthodox Christianity is the only kind taught or sanctioned by the scriptures, and if we hope or expect to escape hell, we must do so by believing, for God evidently meant what he said. Reason plays no part in the salvation scheme, and it is highly essential that this fact be known and established for all time. Says Evangelist Moody: "Don't reason; if you do you are lost." And as none of the sects do reason, except Universalists and Unitarians, we see why they alone will be found on the "left hand" when Jesus repeats his original remark: "Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels." Then will Mr. Billings realize how mistaken he was while on earth, and engaged in singing, "When the roll is called in heaven I'll be there." Then will he see the folly of having warmed and cherished within his breast those fatal doubts which led him to believe hell was a myth and Jesus Christ an elder brother with a moral mission only. It may be that a double-action mind is required to believe all the Bible contains, for there are many passages that apparently contradict each other, but doubt never rises until one begins to think, so the safest way is to read and let the parson do your thinking, choosing, of course, one that is strictly orthodox. In this way there is hope of reaching heaven, and I throw out the suggestion, hoping that Brother Billings will see the error of his ways and profit by it, for the man who lives in Texas, as I did, for two years, certainly deserves the best the next world has to offer.

In conclusion, there is one more fact I wish to establish in connection with Judas, that great and good man who helped to save the world from the wrath of God, by revealing at the critical time the presence and identity of our savior, thus making his mission a success. Mr. Billings, in common with many others, seems to think Judas made a mistake and repented, and he quotes the claim that he threw down the thirty pieces of silver. In the account of his second death we are told that he purchased a field with that money, and the fact that he had a clear conscience is proven beyond all dispute by the size of his abdomen at the time he fell and burst open, as recorded. No man with a guilty conscience can, or ever did, develop a large abdomen, and the fact that the ventral parts of Judas when he died the second time were so large and protuberant, disposes for all time of the idea that his conscience was in a state of perturbation. I hope his opponents are now satisfied, and will unjustly accuse him no more.

C. SEVERANCE.

He Wants Facts.

NEWBURYPORT, MASS., July 29, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Could you not contrive without much expense to determine what is the average attendance, male and female, in the churches say of four or five large towns or small cities in Massachusetts? The places which ought to be selected are of two kinds, viz., residential cities like Salem, Newburyport, Taunton, Plymouth, Newton, New Bedford, Marblehead, and manufacturing places, such as Brockton, Lynn, Lawrence, Haverhill, Fall River.

The census should be taken on four Sundays in September, and four Sundays in January or February, and nothing should be published until all the returns are in. To do this properly there should be one man designated for each church, whose name should be sedulously concealed from the public. Sometimes the leader in the choir is the best man for this purpose, as he is not necessarily sectarian. The time for counting should be during the delivery of the sermon at the morning service, and the counter or teller should state the number of males and females. Where church edifices were not too far apart it might be possible to have one man count two church meetings. If two services were held in the same edifice on Sunday, the teller should report whether the persons who attended the second service were the same that attended the first service, so far as to make a general estimate. It might be impracticable, and in some cases impossible, to do this accurately. But by glancing at the pews and taking the number in each pew separately (and the sex) it would generally appear whether there were any new attendants at the afternoon service. The only real difficulty in getting at an approximate result would be in the Roman Catholic churches, where by reason of the numerous masses and the crowds that go to different masses it would be hard to tell how great was the average daily attendance. In these churches, if you count only the males, however, in all the services, or in two services, and add them together you will get nearly the number of males. The young men do not attend more than one mass per Sunday generally, but the women, particularly the old women, go five times if they can.

I am led to write to you about this because it seems to me that there is a great deal of pious fraud in the statements as to actual attendance. Thus, an article in the Boston Advertiser for July 30, 1895, page 4, column 4, asserts that the census shows that in the Christian churches of the country there are 20,612,806 communicants, or about one-third of the entire population of the country. "This enumeration," comments the Advertiser, "does not include the equally large number of attendants upon religious services, who are not communicants, both children and adults." Such statements appear to suggest that there are some forty-one millions of people in the United States (adults and children) who habitually attend church on Sunday. If this be so, New England is the least religious portion of the United States, for in New England there is no such proportion. A census taken some twenty-three years ago in Newburyport, then a city of 13,000 inhabitants, on a fine Sunday in January, showed a Protestant attendance of 2,216, men, women, and children—a Roman Catholic attendance of 1,448. Such a census to-day would show probably 1,400 Catholics and about 1,400 Protestants. In 1872 there were nominally in the parish, of Catholics and children of Catholics, 2,200 persons who lived in the city and in the surrounding towns. In 1893 the total population in Newburyport, Newbury, and East Salisbury was about 16,000, and in this number were 3,500 Roman Catholics, and 12,510 not Romanists. Of these Roman Catholics, somewhat more than one-third commonly attend church. There is a larger proportion of Catholics who do not attend worship than formerly. In 1872 the average attendance hereabouts of persons who called themselves Catholics, if anything, was 65 per cent habitually, i. e., every Sunday, unless unavoidably detained. Now in 1895 the average attendance of nominal Catholics would hardly exceed 40 per cent. But of those classed as Protestants not one-half are really such. They are Agnostics, or indifferent people, who neither care nor know what theological belief they have. To cut the whole matter short, I express the belief that in this community of 16,000 souls, there are not more than 1,200 Protestants who attend church 40 Sundays in the year; not over 1,500 who attend 30 Sundays, not over 1,700 who attend 10 Sundays in a year. Of Catholics there are perhaps 3,000 who attend once a year, 2,000 who attend four times a year, and 1,000 who attend 45 Sundays in a year. Now this is so far variant from the common impression that it needs verification by enumeration. A counting would do it. Fraud is now practiced by counting two services, forenoon and afternoon, and adding them together, thus making the apparent number 75 per cent greater than the actual. It is disheartening to see the success of this false enumeration. People really seem to believe that Christians are in a majority, whereas Agnostics [indifferents, he probably means] in Massachusetts are in a very great majority.

Would it not be practicable to take a census on four successive Sundays, say from Sept. 10th to Oct. 10th, and from Jan. 10th to Feb. 10th? I select these periods because the first represents the time when the churches are fullest and the last an average time. I suppose June is the month when the churches are at their lowest, i. e., except the vacation months. A still more just way would be to take a census on the first Sunday of every month except August. The census should state whether it was clear, or raining, or snowing, and the thermometer record at 10 A.M. For it is the weather before church that determines the attendance, not the weather during sermon time. Now if only two towns were taken as a starter, interest would be excited and volunteer tellers would probably come forward.

Children's Corner.

Edited by Miss SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Once on a Time.

At teatime in the ruddy light—
Chrysanthemums were in their glory—
My baby came to say good night,
And beg for "just one little story."

I told her how a girl like her
Came long ago, somewhere or other,
And brought her doll and made a stir
And begged a story from her mother.

Who, tired and listless, also crossed
The little, story-begging beauty
With news of how another glossed
Her irksome story-telling duty.

Still backward was the tale referred,
To weary her, but when I ended,
As if I had not said a word,
With looks half-pleading, half-offended,

She clasped my neck—her childish trust
Had made the hardest heart compliant—
"A little one," she said, "please—just About a fairy and a giant."

I kissed her close, and off I went:
"Once on a time," low, slow and steady.
She heaved a sigh of sweet content—
My darling was asleep already.

—Menzies Macdonald, in Good Words.

A Day's Outing.

It was a lovely summer day when we went out to Lincoln Park—Bethia, J. W., William, Bonnie, and I.

In the morning we sat on the veranda when J. W. called, and we told him we were intending an outing, and should start in an hour, and would he join us? It was uncertain, there were some changes of apparel to be made, a long walk home, etc., but, when ready to go, J. W. was on hand, spick and span, and happy in anticipation of a day's pleasure. William, who has recently become the handy boy in our family, was to take care of the dog Bonnie, and to see the park for the first time. Tommy, the other dog of our household, was to remain at home, the faithful caretaker and watchman on the premises in our absence. Bonnie would have howled all day if left behind, being of a very emotional nature, and his doleful moans would have disturbed the neighbors; so, decked in a broad pink ribbon tied in a bow-knot around his little fat neck, his eyes glistened with joy and happiness to think he was to accompany us on our outing.

William—well, you ought to have seen William—one of our family calls him Trilby—when he had got himself fixed up for the day's excursion. He is a dark-skinned boy, or man, rather (for he remembers when Lincoln was president), about four feet high, with a mustache and half side-whiskers. He has all the love of color and display peculiar to his race, and Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like William on this occasion. Very light trousers, a gorgeous vest, ornamented with a pearl and gold banjo pin and a showy watch-chain that looks like gold, from which was suspended a cube of glass called a charm, a dark out-a-way coat, a golf cap that set jauntily upon his head, a flaming red necktie, and a frivolous looking walking stick completed his attire.

"I guess I'll mash somebody's heart this day," said William, flirting his cane as he walked along. We boarded the electric car on Winter street, and were borne swiftly down through the heart of the city, thence eastward, through Flint village, where a large proportion of our French population reside, and crossed our lovely Lake Watuppa at the "Narrows." The pearl-tinted waters were as bright and fair as

When Massasoit, with kingly tread,
Along the strand his sachems led.
Here dwelt his people, free from care,
Each of his land the rightful heir,
But, vanished now, from off the spot
Where chance had cast his happy lot,
No more is seen the Indian face,
No more his wand'ring here we trace.
Another nation now holds sway,
And turns the tide another way;
And where once was forest wide,
Now stands a city in its pride.

Beyond the lake we were soon well out on the country road, only greenery and sweetness on either side. Balmy breezes floated in upon us all the way, breezes laden with the perfume of juniper, sassafras, the swamp honeysuckle, and all the many beautiful woodsey wildings. Tall oaks, sighing pines, hemlock, chestnut, and other forest friends swayed back and forth their branches and flung shadows o'er the road-side, while the tangled vines and thick shrubbery made misty shadows and cool recesses, sending a thousand invitations to spend the day with them instead of visiting haunts whose rural beauty had been touched and changed by the hand of man into form and conventionality. Soon we were at "Beulah," a most enchanting spot, whereon is a beautiful grove of deep-shadowed pines, where camp-meetings are held.

Near by is another grove known as Selahameh, once owned by an eccentric but good-hearted man, who has now gone to rest. Here he loved to come and commune with nature. I remember once of eating watermelons across the road, from his own melon patch, and hearing him the while discourse on the Bible doctrines, of which he had his own translations, which, if not convincing, were at least original.

Leaving Beulah behind, we suddenly came out of the fragrant pines, and Westport Factory village is before us, near running water, a pretty winding river with an Indian name, upon whose banks stand cottages and many more pretentious homes. Upon the stream stands a mill for cleaning cotton waste, and one passenger remarked that a lot of money had been turned out of that same mill. We go over the bridge that spans the river, and soon we come to picturesque "Greenwood Gardens," where shade, shrubbery, and the placid waters of a lake combine to make a lovely and attractive stopping-place. Three miles more and we are at our destination, Lincoln Park, a lively place, with the usual attractions of a summer resort.

The handsome grove is composed of pine and oak trees, and rustic benches, arbors, swings, picnic tables are all around the sloping hills and dells. Two of the monkeys, "Sam" and "Bill," were running races and playing hide-and-seek about the grove. "Sam" espied Bonnie in the summer house, and was bent on making acquaintance, by patting him on the cheek and playing with his ears. Bonnie was disposed to be belligerent, and resented familiarities, but seeing that there was blood in the monkey's eye, he discreetly retreated behind my chair and surveyed the old-time man with disdain from the godets of my gown.

The monkey skipped away to a baby who was rolling on the mossy earth, and peered doubtfully into its face, as though he wondered if his children would ever in course of time look like that one. William was in high feather, visiting the bear, the five-legged calf, the theater, the fortune-teller, the glass-blowers, and all the other attractions, as long as his pocket change held out. I always patronize the merry-go-round, and as I had not with me the children of the Corner, I invited J. W. and Bethia to a seat in my coach. The ride, or the music, seemed to affect their heads, and they were sea-sick, they said, and before they were once around the ring, they both exclaimed—"Let me get out!" We lolled on the ground, listened to the singing birds, the joyous laughter of boys and girls and the sighing music of the trees. We chatted, recited bits and snatches of poems, and read aloud Putnam's "News and Notes" from England, from THE TRUTH SEEKER, that we had taken along as a pocket companion, and George Jacob Holyoake's sublime introduction of Putnam to a Birmingham audience. It was fine. "Read it again!" said J. W., who admires Holyoake from the crown of his head to the sole of his foot. He once drove thirty miles to hear him speak—that was in England, some years ago. Then we read Geo. E. Macdonald's humorous and instructive sermon on "Cyclones and Superstition." Roger de Coverley would never let anybody sleep in his church but himself, and nobody could think of napping while the "Observations" of the sermonizer of THE TRUTH SEEKER are before him.

The dinner hour arrived, the most fashionable hour in the world, and it was a

New England clambake, cooked in the open air. There were one hundred and eighty anxious faces at the tables, and it was very amusing to note how the tried, haggard, fretty, worried looks disappeared with the viands, and left instead smiles and good nature. Clams, lobsters, blue-fish, green corn, sweet potatoes, sausage, dressing, hot coffee, all done to a nicety, and watermelon for dessert. I looked about me, and the pacified expression on the faces seemed to say plainly enough, "These are the gods of my idolatry!" Anyway, any other god with cartloads of spiritual food would have had to take a back seat on that occasion.

Across the road was a big white tent which bore the legend "Gospel Tent," and, a meeting being advertised at 3 P.M., J. W., Bethia, and I walked over to see if sinners are being washed clean in the same old way. How many do you suppose were present that sunny afternoon in that gospel tent there amid the green trees? Just us three and no more! We laughed. We couldn't help it, as we waltzed across the platform to the recitation of a prayer by J. W. The music of the band and the flying feet of the dancers in the pavilion held the people at the park. The dance music, the theater, the monkeys, goats, and merry-go-rounds got the best of it. The gospel of happiness and enjoyment was being preached, and the other kind hadn't a single votary. Is was nowhere. William, who is piously inclined, and vibrates between the Salvation Army and the A. M. E. church, said he had made several trips to the gospel tent, and he "never once seed a soul in it." The souls were over in the other place, if anywhere.

But I am spinning such a long yarn. We came home on an early car to avoid the crowd later, quite refreshed and exhilarated by our day's outing at Lincoln Park.

Correspondence.

LYON, KAN., Aug. 10, 1895.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I am a little girl twelve years old. I have been reading THE TRUTH SEEKER lately, and like it very much. I go to Sunday-school because there is no other place to go to here. My Sunday-school teacher happened to read the contradiction about Judas. She asked me if it wasn't a "hard death for him to die." I said: "It was pretty hard on him to die two ways." Of course, she saw the point, and didn't like it.

I am reading the "Age of Reason." I am also reading the Bible, for, if I am going to fight the enemy, I want to know what kind of weapons they use.

GLADYS GUERIN.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., Aug. 5, 1895.

DEAR MISS WIXON: As I have not written to the Corner for a long time I will now take up my pen and write again. I hope that you and the Corner have not forgotten me. I have not forgotten you.

I will be glad when school begins, because I like to go. I have a little girl friend who says that everything in the Bible is true, but I don't think so. Do you, Miss Wixon? If there are any little girls in the Corner who are Spiritualists I would like to have them write to me, for I intend to be a Spiritualist when I am grown up. I would like to correspond with any little girl.

I remain your little Liberal friend,

ATOHISON, KAN., Aug. 1, 1895.

DEAR MISS WIXON: The good Lord is to blame again. He is forever getting into the soup. At Vanceburg, Ky., July 30th, Richard Cooley, of Fairview, insane upon religion, attempted to cut his wife's throat, but was overpowered, not by the good Lord, though. He will be committed to an asylum. A revival has been in progress at Fairview for some time, and being a deeply religious man, of emotional temperament, Cooley became bereft of reason. Added to this, he was greatly grieved that his wife and children attended a dancing picnic a few days ago for the benefit of the church.

What won't these superstitious religious idiots do? It is becoming dangerous to have them running at large. I think the safest place for all of them is in an asylum, for they are all crazy more or less, and are liable to do anything. Will Mr. Cooley be forgiven and saved for attempting this terrible crime, and will his wife and children be admitted through the pearly gates into the golden city above for dancing at this picnic, or will they be side-tracked to that other city where the climate is so warm? If they escape this terrible city after committing the sins that God has inflicted upon them, then I think that there is a good chance for all; so I will forever keep my nose out of religious affairs and accept with free grace whatever is to come. Your Liberal friend,

JOHN J. I. REMSBURG,

[Our friend John is a reasoner, a philosopher, and his conclusions are correct. We should pity the weak-minded and demented who perform acts shocking to our sense of right and justice.]

There's a lot of work before us, John, in trying, as best we can, to undo the effect of a false system of education. We may not see great results in our time, but our efforts will tell in the long run.—Ed. C. C.]

THE BRAIN AND BIBLE;
OR
THE CONFLICT BETWEEN MENTAL SCIENCE AND THEOLOGY.
By EDGAR C. BEALL, M.D.,
with a preface by
R. G. INGERSOLL.
This is the only work of its kind in the literature of Freethought. Its arguments are based upon scientific phrenology, and appeal directly to the reader's sense of logic and love of justice. It is eloquent as well as convincing.
Price, cloth, $1. Address THE TRUTH SEEKER.

By the census of 1890, the above is the value of
Church Property
in the United States.
Should It Be Exempt from Taxation?
REASONS WHY IT SHOULD NOT.
Our pamphlet with this title contains an Argument for Equality of Taxation, and a Statement of Facts, giving, from the Census of 1890, the value, by Denominations, of Church Property in the United States and in the several States and Territories and in all Cities having 25,000 or more inhabitants; so arranged as to show at a glance the relative standing as to wealth of the leading Denominations and Denominational Groups. Also, much other matter of especial interest to certain Cities, States, and Sections, all comparisons being based upon official figures.
This pamphlet is the only one of the kind published. In no other work are the facts, figures, and arguments to be found. The figures, being derived from the Government Census of 1890, will not be superseded until the census of 1900 shall have been completed—probably about eight years hence. The arguments are unanswerable and will lay the dew of morning on them so long as the injustice of church exemption is suffered to exist.
By single copies the price is 15 cents, but as the work is published specially for distribution by those who favor justice in taxation the following reductions are made:
Ten copies..... $1.00
Fifty copies..... 4.50
One hundred copies..... 8.00

400 Years OF Freethought

By Samuel Porter Putnam

Large Octavo, 1165 pp., Gilt Sides and Back, Marbled Edges. $5.
With The Truth Seeker for One Year, $6.50.

141 FULL-PAGE PORTRAITS!
Of the Most Eminent Freethinkers, of the Past Four Hundred Years.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY announced in October that this superb work was at last ready for delivery. It had been in preparation for so long that some of the subscribers were getting a little impatient and wondering when they would have the opportunity to see for themselves whether it possessed all the merits claimed for it by the publishers. They did not realize the magnitude of the work, and that the six months' delay in getting it out was due to the fact that they were to have fifty per cent more reading than they had been promised and nearly three times as many portraits. Such was the case, however. Instead of six hundred pages of letter-press there are nearly nine hundred, and the fifty portraits promised in the prospectus have multiplied to one hundred and forty-one! Considering the fact that the illustrations are the most costly part of the book—as undoubtedly to many they will also be the most attractive—and properly estimating the expense of the extra three hundred pages of text, it is evident that the subscriber received about one hundred per cent more for his $5 than was guaranteed to him. Well, the nearly eleven hundred copies of the volume subscribed for were sent out, and now we know what the recipients think of their investment. Judging by the letters that reach this office, they are not only satisfied—more than satisfied—but surprised and delighted that they got such a bargain.

As for the subject matter of FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT, it covers nearly every phase of progress and development and presents them in such orderly sequence as to give the best possible picture of human evolution. In Part First we have Freethought as a manifestation and influence; in Part Second, as an organized force. With this history are given sketches of the lives of the men and women who have taken part in the movement. It unites the past and the present. It is a world book and a home book. It fulfils the promise of its inception, and is the most magnificent work ever issued by the Freethought Press.

WITH DAUGHTER'S BABE UPON HIS KNEES.
A new edition of that splendid prose poem "Life," by "the prince of orators," Col. R. G. Ingersoll. It is larger and better than the old edition, and can be framed or placed upon the table as an ornament. In the center of the card appear the portraits of the Colonel and the baby, surrounded by the prose poem, which has been truthfully described as, "one of the masterpieces of the orator and poet, who now, as far as we know, stands alone in the living world." It will make a delightful present, and will be a souvenir not only of intellectual greatness, but of artistic workmanship. It is printed on heavy board, gilt beveled edge. The size is 12x16 inches, and the price only 75 cents, post-paid.

Gems of Thought.

INTENSITY of life is also intensity of helpfulness.—Ruskin.

As soon as some men feel patriotic they want to fight.—Galveston News.

THE desires of a free people are seldom prejudicial to liberty.—Machiavelli.

He lives long who lives well, and the time misspent is not lived, but lost.—Fuller.

WHAT the world needs most is a remedy for narrow-mindedness.—Galveston News.

LET us consider the reason of the case. For nothing is law that is not reason.—Sir J. Powell.

A CLEVER theft was praiseworthy among the Spartans, and it is equally so among Christians, provided that it be on a sufficiently large scale.—Herbert Spencer.

TRUE courage is cool and calm. The bravest men have the least of brutal, bullying insolence, and in the very time of danger are found the most serene and free.

WE sleep, but the loom of life never stops, and the pattern which was weaving when the sun went down is weaving when it comes up to-morrow.—H. W. Beecher.

OF all injustice, that is the greatest which goes under the name of law, and of all sorts of tyranny the forcing of the letter of the law against the equity is the most insupportable.—L'Estrange.

THE spirit of liberty is not merely, as multitudes imagine, a jealousy of our own particular rights, but a respect for the rights of others, and an unwillingness that any man, whether high or low, should be wronged.—Channing.

VOLTAIRE made up his mind to fight the superstitions of his time. He fought with every weapon that genius could devise or use. He was the greatest of all caricaturists, and he used this wonderful gift without mercy. For pure, crystallized wit he had no equal. The art of flattery was carried by him to the height of an exact science. He knew and practiced every subterfuge. He fought the army of hypocrisy and pretense, the army of faith and falsehood.—Ingersoll.

DEMOCRACY is in the music of Wagner, the art of Millet, the poetry of Whitman. It is not a hand given one class at the sacrifice of another, a mode of life laid out for the poor, a tribute to or recognition of the efficacy or holiness of poverty, but loyal tenders both hands all around to rich and poor, prince and peasant, irrespective of antecedent or existing titles or family prestige, exalting neither possession nor disinheritance, frankly everywhere recognizing the movement of its life below and above the local and temporary conditions that are often misjudged to be the profoundest manifests of social and spiritual tendency.—Horace L. Traubel.

THE improver of natural knowledge absolutely refuses to acknowledge authority, as such. For him, skepticism is the highest of duties, blind faith the one unpardonable sin. And it cannot be otherwise, for every great advance in natural knowledge has involved the absolute rejection of authority, the cherishing of the keenest skepticism, the annihilation of the spirit of blind faith, and the most ardent votary of science holds his firmest convictions, not because the men he most venerates hold them, not because their verity is testified by portents and wonders, but because his experience teaches him that whenever he chooses to bring these convictions into contact with their primary source, nature, whenever he thinks fit to test them by appealing to experiment and to observation, nature will confirm them. The man of science has learned to believe in justification, not by faith, but by verification.—Thomas H. Huxley.

IN our lunatic asylums we frequently see persons sent there in consequence of what are called religious mental disturbances. I confess that I think better of them than of many who hold the same opinions and keep their wits and appear to enjoy life very well, outside of the asylums. Any decent person ought to go mad if he really holds such opinions. It is very much to his discredit, in every point of view, if he does not. Anything that is brutal, cruel, and makes life hopeless for most of mankind, and perhaps for whole races, anything that assumes the necessity of exterminating instincts which were given to be regulated, if received, ought to produce insanity in every well-regulated mind. I am very much ashamed of some people for retaining their reason when they ought to know perfectly well that if they were not the most stupid or most selfish of human beings they would become non-compotes at once.—Oliver Wendell Holmes.

THE GIANT DELUSION. A paper read before the Freethought International Congress at Chicago. One of Otto Wettstein's fraternal attacks on Spiritualism.

THE GLORY OF INFIDELITY. To which is added a poem on Thomas Paine. One of Samuel P. Putnam's most brilliant lectures. Every Christian who asks the idiotic question, "What Has Infidelity Done?" should be induced to read this book, if he has to be paid to do it.

HOW CAN WE BE SAVED? Was Jesus Supernaturally Conceived, and did he Rise from the Dead? Israel W. Groh.

INGERSOLL AND JESUS. Showing how the two agree. A poem by Samuel P. Putnam.

THE LIMITATIONS OF TOLERATION. A discussion between Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, Hon. Frederic R. Coudert, Ex-Gov. Stewart L. Woodford, before the Nineteenth Century Club of New York. "Each man has the same right to express to the whole world his ideas that the rest of the world have to express their thoughts to him." Colonel Ingersoll maintains this, the others deny it. Mr. Coudert is a Roman Catholic, Mr. Woodford a Protestant.

MATERIALISM: Its History, and Its Influence Upon Society. Dr. Louis Buchner.

MIRACLES AND MIRACLE WORKERS. A consideration of the Marvels and Miracles of the New Testament. One of John Peck's best books.

MOSES BEFORE THE COURT, or The Forgery of the Old Testament. Dedicated to the Clergy. H. J. Seignenret, M.D.

THE NEW GOD. "It is an open secret that man has always made his Gods. They exist in and through him, as the image exists in and through the mirror. Take away man and you take away God—the image vanishes." This pamphlet, therefore, is a consideration of what kind of a God man should make. Samuel P. Putnam.

ORTHODOXY. A lecture by Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll, and one of that great man's best. The subjects considered are: Orthodoxy Religion Dying Out, Religious Deaths and Births, The Religion of Reciprocity, Mohammed, The Destruction of Art, The Discovery of America, Copernicus and Kepler, Charles Darwin, Special Providence, The Latest Creed, God as a Governor, The Love of God, The Fall of Man, The Atonement, The Second Birth, Inspiration, The Reign of Truth and Love, The Wars It Brought, The Resurrection, The Judgment Day, Pious Evasions, "No Bible, No Civilization," Miracles of the New Testament, The Ascension, Casting out Devils, Necessity of Belief, Eternal Punishment, Some who Are Damned, What I Believe, Immortality. The Great Ingersoll Controversy

Containing the famous Christmas Sermon by Colonel Ingersoll, the protests thereby evoked from the ministers who think they own this country and all therein, and Colonel Ingersoll's replies to the same. A finely gotten up pamphlet. Price, 25 cents.

Liberty for Man, Woman, and Child

"Reading this lecture," remarked a friend the other day, "will make men better; for if a man reads it one night on his way home, the next night he will take along some oranges or something to his family." This lecture is gotten up in the handsome style of "Voltaire" and "Lincoln," and has as a frontispiece a fine photo-engraving of the Colonel and both his grandchildren, Eva and Robert, the little fellow upon his knee, and Eva in her high chair. It is a pretty picture, and the Colonel's millions of friends will take pleasure in it. In this pamphlet is also the Colonel's Tribute to His Brother, which so many have desired to have in convenient form. Price, 25 cents.

VOLTAIRE

"Voltaire was the greatest man of his century, and did more to free the human race than any other of the sons of men." A lecture by INGERSOLL, with portrait of Voltaire. A handsome pamphlet. Every Freethinker will surely want it. Price, 25 cents.

LINCOLN

This is Colonel INGERSOLL's great lecture, printed in a handsome pamphlet, and containing the Century's famous portrait of Lincoln—said to be the best extant. Price, 25 cents.

SHAKSPERE

"An intellectual ocean, whose waves touched all the shores of thought." A lecture by INGERSOLL, with likeness of Shakspeare from the Kesselstadt death mask. Price, 25 cents.

Travels in Faith.

SNOOGS: "Was it not disgraceful the way in which Smiggs snored in church to-day?" Stuggs: "I should think it was. Why, he woke us all up."

MISS GOING: "Why do you object to baseball on Sunday?" Rev. Mr. Rooter: "Because it is impossible for me to attend on that day."—New York Herald.

HOST: "Why, you're surely not going to bed yet, captain. We are going to have prayers presently." Captain: "Aw, yes, thanks very much. I never take anything after dinner."

MR. JACOB AMBACHER, of Berkeley, has been pronounced sufficiently unlike the rest of us to be sent to the Ukiah asylum for the original. He recently entered a church and made off with the big Bible. The commissioners believed that he wanted to read it, and that settled the hash of Jacob Ambacher.—Ambrose Bruce.

ONE of the best stories told by Dean Hole is of an old-fashioned cathedral verger, "lord of the aisles," who, one noon, found a pious visitor on his knees in the sacred edifice. The verger hastened up to him and said, in a tone of indignant excitement: "The services in this cathedral are at 10 in the morning and at 4 in the afternoon, and we don't have no fancy prayers."

"Why, deacon, what are you looking for?" asked Golightly, as he observed the deacon examining his wood-pile the other evening. "Well, I'm just examining this load of wood to see if it is all right. You see, I bought it from Brother Brown yesterday, and in prayer-meeting to-night he called himself so many kinds of a miserable sinner that I thought it just possible it was the quality of this load of wood that was weighing on his mind."

WANTED!—A million boys and girls to attend Sunday-school in Newark, N. J. Boys taught how to kill each other to date! Girls encouraged in anything they want to do! Piety not an object! Sunday-schools must be crowded! The chance of a lifetime! Ho! for the meeting-house where you can leave your gun in the aisle while you wait! Nothing like it! Picnics and Christmas trees out of the race! Library filled with yellow-covered books! More blood, more thunder, more fun, more show than at any other Sunday-school in New Jersey.—New York Press.

THIS is old but always good: Dr. Furness, of Philadelphia, tells a characteristic story about Wendell Phillips. "Several clergymen," he says, "boarded a street car in Boston one day, and one of them, hearing it intimated that Wendell Phillips was on the car, got up and asked the conductor to point him out. The conductor did so, and the minister, going up to the orator, said: 'You are Mr. Phillips, I am told?' 'Yes, sir.' 'I should like to speak to you about something, and I trust, sir, you will not be offended.' 'There is no fear of it,' was the sturdy answer, and then the minister began to ask Mr. Phillips earnestly why he persisted in stirring up such an unfriendly agitation in one part of the country about an evil that existed in another part. 'Why,' said the clergyman, 'do you not go South and kick up this fuss and leave the North in peace?' Mr. Phillips was not the least ruffled, and answered, smilingly: 'You, sir, I presume, are a minister of the gospel?' 'I am, sir,' said the clergyman. 'And your calling is to save souls from hell?' 'Exactly, sir.' 'Well, then, why don't you go there?'"

THE ASCENT OF MAN.

"Professor Drummond's 'Ascent of Man' was discussed in the Assembly of the Free church, and very severely handled."

What? Sprung frae an ape wi' a danglin' bit tailie?

Evolved by a process o' naitural law? Wnat? Me, sir? An elder i' kirk an' a bailie?

That boast o' the bluid o' the Yellow Macaw?

THE ELIXIR OF LIFE

is not in magic potions, "specifics" or electric clasp-trap, but only in wisdom.—THE SCIENCE OF HEALTH. Wise men study nature, shun disease learn to maintain vigor and regain it by reading the most complete book of Medical, Social, Sexual Science, by an eminent physician of 35 years experience. The "old, original, standard" work, endorsed by all, imitated by many, equalled by none. Inspired by wish to aid humanity, it has providentially saved thousands. Its essays on marriage, parentage, adaptation, marital failures, etc., are of inestimable value to all now married or who ever expect to be. The last edition has 1,000 pages, 3 colored charts of vital organs, 200 wood cuts, 21 chromos showing origin of life—development of man. APPENDIX has over 200 Recipes. A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—Freethinkers' Magazine.

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of this volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—Boston Investigator.

AT ABOUT ONE-HALF VALUE.

A small farm of 10 acres 86 perches, located within one and a half miles of Media county seat and within four miles of Chester, Pa., on the Delaware river. Several springs of soft water. good timber growing on the place, some choice apple and pear trees in fruiting condition. House and barn on the place, but are old buildings. Within five minutes walk of the railroad station, 9 miles from Philadelphia. Trolley line between Media and Chester, with less than five minutes walk.

The place is specially well located for a florist, and it would be a fine summer residence for one who would put a modern house on it. Eight years ago the land adjoining sold for $618 per acre, and no land near it has sold as low as that since. Several smaller places have sold at $1,000 per acre. The land slopes toward the southwest, overlooking beautiful woodland scenery.

THE PLACE CAN BE BOUGHT FOR $3,500.

News of the Week.

THE revolution in Ecuador gives promise of being successful.

REPORTS of fighting and massacres have been received from Bulgaria.

At the present writing, war between Peru and Bolivia seems to be inevitable.

ON August 17th eight men were killed and ten injured by a blast near Clearfields, Pa.

THE National Democratic Silver Conference at Washington on August 15th was slimly attended.

A STRIKE of the garment workers (except the coat-makers, who recently won their fight) is on in this city.

THERE was a tumult in the Chamber of Deputies of Belgium when the religious education bill passed second reading.

A COMMISSION is now investigating the recent massacre of missionaries at Kucheng, China. Arrests have been made.

THE fourteenth parliament under Queen Victoria opened on August 12th. Speaker Gully was re-elected without a dissenting vote.

THE bicycle is coming into use in the distribution of newspapers. One paper in Nebraska has bought sixty for its delivery boys.

ALL the Lake Superior copper mines have raised wages since August 1st, generally an advance of 10 per cent. being given.

THE corn crop of the United States this year promises to be very large. It is now estimated that it will reach 2,000,000,000 bushels.

LORD WOLSELEY becomes commander-in-chief of the British armies, succeeding the Duke of Cambridge, resigned. Lord Wolseley is an Irishman.

A MAGISTRATE in this city fined a private detective for "shadowing" a man at the instigation of his wife, holding him to be guilty of "disorderly conduct."

IN Alabama timber thieves dug a ditch thirteen miles in length through which to float logs from government lands to a saw-mill hidden in the valley below.

THE American Wool and Cotton Reporter says that more than 100 new woolen mills have been constructed in the United States within the last six months.

THOMAS HOVENDEN, the distinguished artist, was instantly killed near Philadelphia on August 14th, while trying to save a little girl from an approaching train.

GENERAL and UNITED STATES SENATOR MAXEY (ex), of Texas, died at Eureka Springs, Ark., on August 16th. He was born in Monroe county, Ky., March 30, 1825.

IF a man forgets where he is when on a park bench in this city, reading his paper, and drops to sleep, he is taken to the police station and fined by the magistrate the next morning.

SPAIN is mobilizing her reserves for service in Cuba, and, in one instance at least, volleys had to be fired over their heads to induce them to embark for the "Ever-Faithful Isle."

RETAIL merchants in Chicago are agitating for a prohibitive license tax on department stores for the ultimate purpose of preventing the lowering of the selling prices of commodities.

SILVER Democratic conventions have recently been held in Missouri and Texas. The regular convention in Mississippi declared for free silver, and the outvoted silver men in the Iowa regular convention seem disposed to bolt.

It is contended that there is no real competition between the Standard Oil Company and the Russian syndicate, they having, it is said, divided the territory open to trade between them, each supplying certain countries.

SENATOR PEPPER has written a letter in which he comes out strongly in favor of a currency based on land values. He has discarded silver and the sub-treasury plan as sure remedies, and says that the chief trouble with the country is interest and rent.

THE best known publisher in Europe, Baron Bernhard Christian Tauchnitz, of Leipzig, is dead, at the age of seventy-nine. At a time when there was no international copyright, he sought out authors and obtained their permission to the republication of their works, and voluntarily paid them.

THE attacks of the Prohibitionists have resulted in the closing of the Hotel Orleans at Spirit Lake, Iowa, practically ruining the resort so far as the patronage of the wealthy is concerned. Seventy-five guests had to leave, including United States Senator Gear and Congressman Henderson.

THE Sunday-closing crusade has nearly depopulated the northern resorts on that day. Bronx Park, Crotona Park, and others in that direction were almost deserted last Sunday. Two months ago there were tens on tens of thousands of people there every Sunday; now they go to Coney Island and other places not under the rule of this city.

HARRY DE WINDT, the explorer, purposes to make a trip overland from America to Europe, starting from Sitka in March, 1896. His object is to explore Alaska beyond Mt. St. Elias and the north-eastern part of Siberia. He will cross Bering Straits in the winter on the ice; the distance is thirty-two miles. The whole journey will be a long, perilous, and expensive one.

GOVERNOR EVANS, of South Carolina, says that the "blind tigers" are taking the state; that liquor is sold openly at more places than when license was the legal system. He says that the state is paying the dispensary constables $5,000 per month, but that they are utterly unable to cope with the situation, and he will now put every city and town under the metropolitan police if necessary to enforce the law.

WHAT THE CHRISTIAN BIGOTS ARE WORKING FOR.

Special NEW SUBSCRIBER Offer.

We wish, for two good and valid reasons, to greatly extend the circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER. First, we want its influence for good and its efforts for greater liberty of thought to be more widely distributed, and consequently more effective. Second, we want more subscribers to help pay its expenses and enable us to do more work. And we wish to emphasize both of these reasons. Our present subscribers can do a great deal for us if they will, and to get them to aid us we are willing to reward them; we therefore make this SPECIAL NEW SUBSCRIBER OFFER:

To any subscriber now on our list who will get a new name for the list for one year, sending us three dollars for the same, we will send free a copy of the FREETHINKER'S PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK, in board covers (price TWO DOLLARS).

And to anyone whose name is not now on our list we make this offer: Send us three dollars for the paper one year, and we will send you free the PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK.

The pictures in the FREETHINKER'S PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK were made and the text written to show the absurdity and untruthfulness of the Church's claim to being a divine and beneficent institution, and to reveal the abuses of a union of church and state. It has 185 Full-page Illustrations, with copious citations of Facts, History, Statistics, and Opinions of Scholars to maintain the argument of the Artist. The Designs are by WATSON HESTON and include a portrait of the designer. The pictures are classified as follows: Of those representing Uncle Sam and the Priests there are 16; representing The Church Robbing the People, 2; Thanksgiving, 3; Sabbath Laws, 6; Children and the Church, 11; Woman and the Church, 10; The Church and Thomas Paine, 6; Studies in Natural History, 4; The Bible and Science, 2; The Clergy and Their Flocks, 15; Piety in Our Penitentiaries, 1; The Atonement Scheme, 4; The Lord and His Works, 4; Prayer, 2; The Creeds, 10; Christians and Mohammedans, 1; Samples of Christianity's Work, 2; Missionaries, 5; The Lord's Instruments, 1; Bible Doctrines and Their Results, 25; Church and Slavery, 1; Priests and Politics, 2; Ireland and the Church, 4; Church Ideas of Civilization, 2; Uses of the Cross, 1; Unkind Reflections on the Church, 4; Persecutions by the Church, 9; Some Allegories, 12; Heaven, 3; Hell, 6; Miscellaneous, 7.

This offer cannot apply to renewals. Premiums for them can be found on the second page of this issue. We are giving five dollars' worth for three in this offer, and there is no profit in it except that we shall get many renewals of these subscriptions; the subscribers will also, probably, buy a few books from time to time, and the small margin on them may make us whole. Induce your neighbor to subscribe, and so get the book for yourself. Or, if you are not now a subscriber, send us three dollars and get both paper and book—FIVE DOLLARS' WORTH FOR THREE DOLLARS.

Read what the papers and people have said of the book and see if it is not worth while to make a strong effort to obtain it. The book has had a large run; five thousand copies have been sold, and everyone who paid two dollars for it says it is worth a good deal more. Now we are giving it away, and you can get a copy if you will. Do not delay, but get it now.

SPECIMEN PRESS NOTICES.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait-painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—Freethinkers' Magazine.

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of this volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—Boston Investigator.

Send us a new subscriber and get the book free of all expense to you. Or, if you are not now a subscriber, send us $3 and get the book and the paper for one year.

What a New Subscriber, Who Has Received His Pictorial Text-Book, Says of It.

LAMAR, Mo., May 8, 1895.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: The "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book" is received, and after a careful examination of the work I unhesitatingly pronounce it one of the most impressive Freethought works ever issued from the press. It will indeed "corner the parson" and all his flock, and I shall take great pleasure in showing the book to my orthodox friends. As a reference book it is invaluable, and it should find a place in every Freethinker's library.

Respectfully, W. F. BARRY.

When Renewing Your Subscription, Take Advantage of These Good Offers

For $6.50 we will send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year ($3) and S. P. Putnam's "Four Hundred Years of Freethought" ($3.50). Large Octavo, 1150 pages, gilt sides and back, marbled edges—the most magnificent work ever issued by the Freethought Press. 140 Half Tone Engravings of the Prominent Freethinkers of the past four centuries.

The object of this work is to present the Course of Freethought throughout the Civilized World from the time of Columbus and Bruno to the time of Ingersoll. It is a radical Historic Record of the greatest developments of the human race. It reveals Freethought as an intellectual, moral, literary, social, industrial, and political movement. It shows what Freethought is in itself, how manifold are its influences, and with what promise we can hail its future triumph. "FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT" embraces the most illustrious pages of human history, adorned with the brightest genius, radiant with the most splendid poetry, rich with the greatest inventions and discoveries, and ennobled with freedom's most shining advance. Nothing can be more interesting or more inspiring to the pioneer workers of to-day, to those who are still in the van for human rights and progress. No Liberal can afford to be without this book. It contains the greatest thoughts and the greatest deeds of the greatest men in one harmonious and magnificent whole, a vivid picture of man's sublimest evolution, with the added glory of woman's emancipation from the chains and slavery of a barbaric church.

Darwin and After Darwin.

An Exposition of the Darwinian Theory.

By GEORGE J. ROMANES.

A systematic Exposition of what may be termed the Darwinism of Darwin, and intended to be of service to the general reader rather than to professional naturalists.

Mr. Romanes is well known as one of the most interesting of English writers upon evolution, besides ranking with Professor Huxley in scientific knowledge and ability. And this is a part of his conclusion regarding the great subject of Design, to which the church so often refers:

"Thus whether we look to the facts of adaptation or to those of beauty, everywhere throughout organic nature we meet with abundant evidence of natural causation, while nowhere do we meet with any independent evidence of supernatural design."

Adaptation and beauty are alike receiving their explanation at the hands of a purely mechanical philosophy. All nature has thus been transformed before the view of the present generation in a manner and to an extent that has never before been possible; and inasmuch as the change which has taken place has taken place in the direction of naturalism, and this to the extent of rendering the mechanical interpretation of nature universal, it is no wonder if the religious mind has suddenly awakened to a new and a terrible force in the words of its traditional enemy—Where is now thy God?"

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with a little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroine. The narrative is, in the main, a history of a working-girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business-men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrites. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Labor is Not a Crime.

"Religious freedom, as guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States, is a good thing, but when carried to an unreasonable extent, as the Seventh-Day Adventists have attempted, it is one of the most dangerous evils that could threaten the republic. By the same process of reasoning that it seeks to violate Sunday laws it might also claim the right to offer up human sacrifices or commit any other crime that might be dictated by a disordered brain."—Macon (Ga.) News.

What shall be said of the alleged intelligence of an editor who cannot discriminate between religious rites that are invasive of liberty and life and religious observances that injure no man? Human sacrifices—like that of the daughter of Jephthah by her father and of Jesus by God—are crimes in themselves, while work and play on Sunday, as on other days, are not crimes in themselves, nor even misdemeanors. But Sunday freedom is not merely a question of religious observance, although to those who believe that Saturday is the real Sabbath it is a denial of religious liberty to punish them for working on Sunday; the fundamental issue is one of human liberty, of the right of the individual to seek happiness in his own way, at his own cost. The News adds insult to injury by suggesting that the Adventists should be put in some state charitable institution, as "they are harmless except in so far as they seek to break the laws regulating the Sabbath, and but for their irrational ideas on this point would probably make good citizens." The coolness of that! And it comes from the representative of divisions of Methodists and Baptists who are more under the influence of uncontrolled impulse, and less educated, than any other Christians in the country, not excepting the Salvation Army and the rank and file of the Catholics. "Of course, as a rule they [Adventists] are of that class whose prejudices are more easily excited and whose credulity is more easily imposed upon," says the News. Think of that, coming from an editor who cannot distinguish between murder and honest work! Think of that, as the utterance of a man who is so credulous as to believe that one revolution out of seven of the earth around the sun is sacred, and so prejudiced in favor of one holy day that he is ready to send to the insane asylum his fellow-Christians who do not agree with him! Surely that is a case of the African brunette declaiming against the dark color of the Swedish blonde!

Protestant Suckers Taking Bait and Hook.

It is no wonder that Catholics despise Protestants; the latter are so easily "worked." They are so credulous and unsuspicious, that the priestly confidence man does not have sufficient exercise for his inveigling faculties. Were they as logical as they are superstitious, Rome would have had them back in the fold long ago.

Recently there was held in this city the convention of the Catholic Total Abstinence Union. It attracted wide attention, and has provoked much discussion. One of its most notable incidents was the exciting scene when State Senator O'Sullivan denounced the present crusade for Sunday closing. He exposed the pretensions of the crusaders in a masterly way. His reasoning was clear and coherent, but it provoked fierce resentment, and Archbishop Corrigan had to exert his authority to restore order, and give the Senator opportunity to conclude his address. Police Commissioner Roosevelt followed Senator O'Sullivan, but, as an answer to the first speaker, his "reply" was woefully inadequate. It did not touch the question at issue, and was sophistical and misleading. But it startlingly illustrated the readiness of Protestants to play into the hands of the Catholic leaders. Mr. Roosevelt and his associates are in power because the people of this city were tired of Tammany methods. Tammany was in power largely because of the support it received from the Catholic hierarchy, with Archbishop Corrigan at the head. The church did not see fit to denounce the non-enforcement of the Sunday excise law while Tammany was in power. Why, then, is it so eager to have it enforced now that Tammany is in the dust of defeat? Why the sudden change of front? Why all this righteous indignation against those who will not join in the hue and cry for the enforcement of law "because it is law?" Why this lightning change of heart? What is the game of the church? The answer to these questions is not far to seek.

In Austria, Rome fights against the separation of church and state, against the liberty of religious worship. Here she ostensibly favors both. In France, while the republic was in the experimental stage, Rome antagonized it with all the weapons at her command. When, however, it seemed that the republic would endure, she had a fresh revelation, and French Catholics were instructed in their duties to the new form of government. So in New York; while Tammany controlled the city, the hierarchy was hand and glove with it, and did not, apparently, suffer very much in its conscience because of the failure of the police to close the saloons on Sunday. Tammany was then the machine, and the church had no objection to helping run it. Now there is a new machine, and Corrigan and his subordinates are anxious to get their hands on its levers. Tammany has ceased to be useful to them, and they are ready to throw it over and take up with the new love. "The king is dead; long live the king!" Of course, there is nothing the least surprising in all this; the change of front here pointed out is in perfect harmony with the traditional policy of Rome. But the surprising part of the play is the awed stupidity of the Protestant dupes. The bait has been brought out right under their eyes; it has been put on the hook in the bright light of day, and the hook cast into the waters of popular agitation in full view of everybody, and yet the Protestant suckers are piling twenty deep on top of each other in the frantic effort to each be first to get the barbs into his gills. If it were not for the ever-present suggestion of imminent tragedy, the whole performance would be irresistibly comic.

Editor Godkin, of the Evening Post, is caught; he has swallowed everything in sight and only regrets that there was not more of it so that his capacity for being taken in could have been put to a severer test. In the issue of August 8th he devotes more than a column to the laudation of the church for the attitude it has assumed at this moment. The convention, he says, was indorsed by the "presence and sympathy of the highest dignitaries of the church in this country, and of the special legate of the Pope himself," but he makes no attempt to explain the silence and inaction of these dignitaries while Tammany was in a position to grant favors and was profiting by the same "law-breaking" that has so suddenly incurred the displeasure of said dignitaries.

"Many active politicians were present of the kind that attend primaries and manage conventions. Yet the feeling of the meeting was so evidently and overwhelmingly in favor of enforcing the excise law, especially of closing the saloons on Sunday, that the lone Tammany orator, put up to test the sentiment of Catholics on the great Tammany platform of not enforcing the law, retired in complete discomfiture."

Where was this overwhelming "feeling" less than a year ago? Those "active politicians," who "attend primaries and manage conventions," what did they do when Tammany was on the throne? Did they or Archbishop Corrigan object to the "great Tammany platform of not enforcing the law"? Why this access of Sabbatarian zeal? Why have they all become so extremely "law-abiding" since the election of last November?

"Discomfiture is visible in other quarters also. The Sun got wind last week of what was coming, was flatly notified, in fact, that the uproarious Tammany campaign it was going to conduct on the platform of violating the Sunday law would be a campaign in which the Catholic church would take the other side. Since then it has worn a distant and abstracted air when the subject was referred to."

So it appears that the Catholic church can muzzle the press! If there had been a gradual growth of sentiment in the membership of the church against the "violation of law" we should have heard something of it long before the overthrow of last fall. The fact that the change of front is instantaneous proves that the whole movement is the result of a definitely laid plan to advance the interests of the church by seeking new political affiliations.

"Now that the threatened is the actual, now that the authorities and the representatives of the Catholic church have made their position so unmistakable, the hilarity of a great many statesmen will in like manner be checked. Senator Hill will take a little time to think it over before he writes another letter in favor of open saloons on Sunday, law or no law. The Democratic state committee will be fully as cautious as was the Republican in handling this dynamite cartridge. Inner Tammany circles will be again shrouded in that gloom which they thought was surely lifting before the prospect of their coming back to power as the champions of lawlessness."

This means simply that the liberties of the citizens of New York are the playthings of the Catholic church; no political party will dare challenge a contest with it by declaring for Sunday freedom. It will no longer trust exclusively to Tammany, for it has been shown that Tammany is not absolutely master of the city and state. Hereafter the church will hold its vote in trust for the party that will give it the most. The Protestant churches also want to do that, but they have not the same sure grip on their adherents that Rome has, as the Post shows in the closing paragraphs of its editorial. Strange, is it not, that after all this the Post cannot see that Rome, as ever, is aiming at universal dominion and hence is perfectly willing to use the prohibition and "law-enforcing" sentiments as means to the end sought! Not that there are not sincere temperance men and women in that church, for there are many, but the temperance question is one distinct and apart from the issue now being fought in this city and state.

The Post says that the official and authoritative attitude of the Catholic church towards the liquor traffic and the Sunday question has long been known. And we have also known her practical attitude. She has generally allied herself with the party which was inclined to do the least to restrict the first, while as to Sunday observance she has been content if her "children" spent the morning in the performance of religious duties; for the rest of the day they could enjoy themselves about as they saw fit. But the time has come when she thinks that it is to her interest to change her policy. As often pointed out in these columns, the Catholic church is rapidly assuming the leadership in the Sunday law movement, and it begins to look as though she would soon be found in the same position in the prohibitory campaign. This infallibly indicates that in the judgment of her leaders—and no men are more astute—she can greatly augment her power by an alliance with the Protestants to secure the adoption of prohibitory laws and the stricter enforcement of the observance of the Catholic Sunday. Once in the saddle she would relax towards transgressions of these laws and remorselessly enforce conformity in the essential matters of faith. "Platforms are made to get in on," as has been said, and Protestants and others who help Rome "get in" on any sort of a moralistic platform are the simplest of the simple, utterly unfit to be at large without guardians.

"Of course, the peculiar value of this great Catholic demonstration at the present juncture lies in the fact that it reveals the existence of an immense political power on the side of the observance of law and a quiet Sunday. The Catholic vote has undoubtedly been largely a Tammany vote."

Is the Post so gullible as to believe that this great vote will be shifted in one short year as the result only of a change in intellectual and moral convictions? No, it understands that it is the mastership of the priest that will transfer the vote from Tammany to the new machine. It knows that the Catholic electorate is "an immense political power" because it can be controlled by the priest. Listen:

"It is further to be considered that the working Catholic priests of this city are in a position to know and to influence the political sentiments of vast numbers of foreign-born voters. Their testimony is far more valuable than that of an equal body of Protestant clergymen. . . . They also carry greater weight than Protestants because their views have a way of affecting the votes of their congregations. Of too many Protestant clergymen the politicians will say, as Lord Carteret said of Bishop Sherlock, 'Oh, he talks like a parson; and consequently is so used to talk to people that don't mind him that I left him to find it out at his leisure, and shall have him again for all this whenever I want him.' Catholic priests are not so open to this charge, and their arraying themselves, with so many of their people, on the side of enforcement of law and resistance to the arrogant pretensions of saloonists to special privileges, cannot fail to give a different political aspect to the whole question."

And still the Post, in its eagerness to catch at straws or logs to save itself and its party from political drowning, utters no word of warning against the terribly dangerous power of this priesthood, and is perfectly willing to use it to choke the life out of liberty in the name of "law." Could folly be more fatuous?

It seems, then, to be settled that Protestant Sabbatarians and Catholic schemers have joined forces to secure a "quiet Sunday" by means of unconstitutional and invasive laws that are in no sense needed to protect the personal and property rights of the inhabitants of the city or of the state outside the city or of the nation at large. With the two divisions of the church working in real harmony it would appear that they can obtain any Sunday law that they want, even one decreeing compulsory attendance on church services. And any law that they could get would be enforced on the same ground that the excise and barber laws of this state are enforced now—the ground that it is the duty of the citizen to obey and of the official to enforce laws "because they are laws"—regardless of their unconstitutionality or of their criminal character.

At the convention of the Catholic Union, heretofore described, its president, Rev. Father Cleary, said that "the liquor power, intrenched behind a fortification of wealth gathered from the earnings of the unfortunate," had grown "defiant of public opinion" and was "desecrating the sanctity of our Sunday." "Our Sunday" is a very fitting expression in the mouth of a Catholic priest, much more at home there than on the lips of a Protestant preacher, but none the less it warns us that the church is much more concerned for the sanctity of a day than for the well-being of the patrons of the saloon. Did it occur neither to Father Cleary nor to the Post that the church itself is "intrenched behind a fortification of wealth gathered from the earnings of the unfortunate"? Its hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of property were not earned by the priests and bishops and archbishops and cardinals who administer this wealth and wield the influence its possession bestows. No inconsiderable part of this church property has come from the pockets of outsiders, through the exemption of church property from taxation. Talk as you may of the "arrogant power of the saloon," it has not yet been able to place itself in the dead-beat list with the Catholic and Protestant churches. The will to do so may be there, but the ability has been lacking. The church has had both the will and the ability.

The Kansas Convention.

Mr. George W. Jones, the new secretary of the Kansas Freethought Association, sends us a report of the recent meeting of that organization at Forest Park, Ottawa. We judge from the report that our Kansas friends had a pleasant time and good speeches. From the program, we should incline to the opinion that the occasion was more social than otherwise, more attention being paid to the amenities than to the business of Freethought.

As the report we print comes from the secretary, we suppose it is official, and includes mention of all the work done. If that is so, the Association seems to have limited itself to the Harman case in its practical work, which is hardly all that should have been done. There is no reference to the position of their neighbor Wise, and the expression of their views on the Sunday war is limited to an extract from the letter of the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER. That the Editor was not as forgetful of other issues as the extracts from his epistle would have led one to believe, we print it here entire:

"NEW YORK, August 2, 1895.

"MRS. ETTA SEMPLE, Secretary of the Kansas Freethought Association—Dear Madam: It would give me great pleasure to be with you all at your Annual Convention, but Kansas is a good way from this village, and it cannot be this year.

"You have met to further the greatest cause for which human beings can labor—the cause of Liberty—and I hope everyone will realize the gravity of the fight now on hand not only in your state but all over the country. Kansas was once recognized as the foremost state in resisting tyranny, but I am afraid that it has retrograded. In your prison you have one man whose only offense is that he tried to make the lot of woman more tolerable by educating men to be gentlemen as well as husbands. I do not believe that all husbands are brutes, but there are enough ignorant ones to make Mr. Harman's work a benevolent necessity, and his imprisonment is an outrage against the freedom of the press. I hope you will have the wisdom and the power to do something practical for his release. When you send your greetings to him in his cell—now made doubly lonely by the thought that his wife cannot be the first to welcome him on his release—send mine, too.

"You also have in your state another person who is on his way to join Mr. Harman unless you, his friends, can make a public sympathy which shall deter the Christian bigots from fully expressing their sentiments of love toward unbelievers in superstition. Mr. Jacob B. Wise, of Clay Center, has done nothing that the church people have not done a million times and more—that is, sent part of the 'holy' Bible through the United States mail. The animus of his prosecution you all know. It is to stop the infidel from arguing against the 'holy' book; to prevent the minister from being beaten in debate; to fortify the pulpit against the pew. There is too much liberty, the clergy think, when an unlettered doubter can have the privilege of throwing up to a theologically-educated vicar of Christ the imperfections of his paper fetish. Ministers think that liberty ends with the freedom to believe. To doubt is blasphemy, and would spoil their trade. Mr. Wise should have your heartiest aid, your moral influence, and your financial assistance. It is not he alone that is stricken, but all of us.

"There is also a great deal of other work to do. The Sunday laws are sitting heavier and heavier upon us each month almost, and the churches are fastening their hold upon the country through them. Concerted, determined, and persistent opposition should be developed against these laws in every town in the land. Let the word be, No compromise! no settlement of this question short of the repeal of all Sunday laws.

"There are other matters of vital importance, but you of Kansas have work enough in these for this year. I hope you will do something more than 'resolute' and have a good time. Help Wise, help Harman, and do what you can to educate the people so that the dead will govern them no longer. Live for the living, work for liberty, and help your neighbors to get sense.

"I am glad to say that I have a good many friends in Kansas. I hope they will all be at your Convention. Convey to them my regards and confidence in their ability and zeal. Tell John Remsburg and Collings and your other leaders to set their thinkers to work on these matters, for, as the incomparable Colonel asks, if God didn't intend a man to think, what did he give him a thinker for? But don't ask this question of a minister, for he can't answer, and nowadays the clergy are having trouble enough, so much, in fact, that they are invoking the aid of the United States to protect them. The Rev. Mr. Vennum will tell you so.

"I hope you will send me a long report of good work begun by your association at this convention. And you must impress upon those there that they are not to backslide when they go home, when the enthusiasm of numbers and personal contact has cooled. The war will last longer than any of us, and our soldiers must be on duty every day. Only once a year won't do. Remember, 'That army is the bravest that can be whipped the greatest number of times and fight again.'

"I confidently look for liberty to be finally and actually established in this country. But it must be, as in '76, the heretics who lead the way.

"Yours fraternally, E. M. MACDONALD.

"Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER."

It seems to us that it would have been a graceful and useful thing for the Kansas folks to have directed at least one resolution at the United States district attorney in regard to Mr. Wise and another at the attorney-general of the United States in regard to Mr. Harman. They could not have done any harm. In view also of the general enforcement of antiquated blue Sunday laws, and the attempted enactment of still more stringent measures, it might have been well, too, to have served notice on the church people of the state that there are a good many people alive who do not approve of such doings. We shall still hope that these things were done, and that the new secretary forgot to incorporate them in his otherwise interesting report.

"Eleven Protestants, including an English missionary, his family, and assistants, have been killed in China. If they were massacred for their faith in Christ, who would not envy them their fate?"—Catholic Review.

Well, we would not. We envy no one who dies for a cause. We admire the courage and devotion that lead men to take the risk of death rather than surrender to tyranny, but we do not envy them when they die. Life is better than death for those who can enjoy it. For those who cannot, we may well be glad when they are relieved from suffering, but so long as life has joy for us we are very foolish if we envy them the ceremonies or the graveworm. Let us be done forever with the deformities of asceticism and the fantastic inanities of superstition.

"Lightning this season has seriously disturbed the old sense of security which the uneducated mind felt in a church. Four accounts of death and damage have come to hand to men and women assembled at worship. At Quakertown, N. J., a stroke of lightning prostrated twenty members of a congregation at the conclusion of the benediction, and several of the victims will die. There are other uneducated minds who will instantly point out that this is a fine example of the utter indifference of the thing called providence to the desires of human beings. They would hardly argue, however, if spontaneous combustion occurred on a steamship, and valuable lives were lost, that there were no owners to the vessel."—Nym Crinkle, in the World.

Nym Crinkle must think that the World's readers are an uneducated lot, lacking natural sense withal, to be taken in by such a non sequitur as that. Does Nym Crinkle want to say that God is as helpless in the storm as the owners of the vessel would be under the circumstances? That is what he does say. The vessel's owners do not want it destroyed, but they are finite in knowledge and power, and cannot control the elements. Does God want the churches destroyed and his worshippers killed by the cyclone and the lightning? If he does, what becomes of his benevolence? If he does not, where is his all-wisdom and all-power, and in either event what is the relevancy of Crinkle's illustration? Newspaper paragraphers should not get into water beyond their depth when they have not been educated to swim.

"Providence" has lately been guilty of another mean little trick that but for the admirable discipline of a ship's crew would have been a terrible tragedy. In a dense fog, the Lyon ran into and sunk the Seaford. The boats were at once manned and perfect order was maintained. But the boats were not launched, as the Lyon came alongside the Seaford and took off her crew and passengers. The latter lost all their baggage, but when the matter was presented to the agent of the steamships at New Haven that gentleman said that they had no redress, as the sinking of the Seaford through collision with the Lyon was an "act of Providence." Had the Seaford gone down through the carelessness of either of the ships, the passengers would have been reimbursed for their losses, but as it went down through the carelessness of "Providence" they will receive nothing. It was ever thus.

Those eminently pious "patriots," the editor and cartoonist of the American Citizen, of Boston, are to be congratulated on their powers of discrimination. On the first page of that paper of the issue of August 10th there is a cartoon entitled "Un-guarded Gates." It is intended to show what horrible evils flow through the broken gates of restriction on the tide of immigration. There are to be seen the "Mafia," "degraded politics," "sectarianism" (as though there could be a worse sectarianism than that represented by such "patriots" as the American Citizen and its congeners), "pestilence," "crime," "pauperism," "ignorance," "degeneration," "disease," and "filth," and in the midst of these "ATHEISM"! We trust that our Atheistic readers appreciate the delicate compliment paid them by the A. P. A. paper in thus associating their belief with Mafiaism, degeneration, filth, ignorance, crime, and the rest.

We have in preparation, to be out in a short time, a new edition of the "Crimes of Preachers." About fifteen extra pages are required to hold the latest additions to this list of famous preachers who have "broken the bread of life" to their flocks, and incidentally, while doing it, about all of the commandments. To adorn this monument of Christian endeavor we have put on a new cover, of which the advertisement elsewhere is a duplicate in black. On the book it appears in gorgeous colors—many hues, like Joseph's coat. It is very pretty, and the preachers cannot find fault with our typographical undoing of their holy selves. But notwithstanding the additions and the pretty covers in colors, so anxious are we to spread the gospel and to make known the work of the church of Christ, we have made no increase in the price, and will still send a copy of the book upon receipt of 25 cents, or five copies for $1. Orders may be sent right along, and they will be filled quickly when we get the book away from the binder.

"There are many jaded souls who must make their Sunday serve a double purpose—direct spiritual culture, through private reading and church service in the morning, and physical recuperation in the afternoon. Only, we may be sure that no Sunday is well spent which does not send the spender back to his week-day work, not only refreshed in body, but also in spirit, with a little higher ideal of justice, mercy, humility, and reverence, with a little clearer faith in God, a little more spiritual hope for himself, and a little stronger and more enduring love for his fellowmen."—The Outlook.

The man prevented by Sabbath laws from enjoying himself and recuperating his mental and physical energies on Sunday elsewhere than in the church is not very likely to cherish "a little higher and more enduring love" for his Christian "fellowmen" who have denied him the opportunity to rest and play in such manner as he thinks best for himself. The victim of Sabbath legislation will not return to his weekly toil with a "little higher ideal" of the justice of his religious neighbors. On the contrary, his heart is filled with disgust at their hypocrisy and hatred of their meddlesomeness and tyranny. It is possible for them to make him suffer on Sunday by means of their intolerant legislation, but they cannot thereby make him love their savage creed or respect them as men and women. The tyrant is never loved by his slaves, although often eulogized by the timid among them and fawned on by sycophants. Let Sabbatarians take this truth to heart.

"In analyzing the causes of the secularization of the church, a modern writer says: 'I believe, if you trace its hidden roots far enough, you would always, or nearly always, find that they lie in the prior secularization of the Christian home.' Substitute for the idea of secularization that of [non] attendance upon church services, and have we not the real explanation of the dearth of young men in the house of God? Can we reasonably expect devout attendance upon the services of the church to come from Christless homes?"—Congregationalist.

The lesson to Freethinkers is a very obvious one—secularize your homes. Let them and your public agencies of entertainment and instruction leave nothing lacking to be desired by the mind of a healthy child. Cultivate intellect, emotions, and the body; give to them the freest and fullest opportunities for exercise. Leave to the church nothing to do for your children but to teach them the follies of superstition, and it will find itself unable to do even that.

"The conflict concerning religion in our day is narrowing down more and more to a battle between Pantheism and Christianity proper. The remembrance of this fact may save some good people from much waste of time and confusion of thought."—Nashville Christian Advocate.

The "confusion of thought" is in the mind of the Nashville editor. Christianity cannot properly be set over against Pantheism. The foes of the latter are Atheism and Theism. Christianity's foes are the other forms of so-called revealed religion, and Rationalism. Theism is a part of Christianity, but not less is it a part of Judaism, Mohammedanism, and some other world religions. Can it be possible that the Christian Advocate means that the conflict is now narrowed down to the issue of Theism versus Pantheism? That would amount to the admission that all the distinctive tenets of "Christianity proper"—Special Creation, Revelation, the Fall, the Redemption, and the Judgment—have fallen before the onslaughts of Rationalism. This is substantially true, but we did not suppose that such an orthodox journal as the Advocate would for a moment concede it to be true in any degree.

A few weeks ago we sent notices to those of our subscribers who were indebted to us on their subscription account, and we are glad to say that a great many of them kindly responded with promptness. There are many, however, from whom we have as yet had no word, and to them we address these appealing remarks. We want some money, and want it badly, else we wouldn't say anything about it. But the cost of getting out the paper has to be paid regularly, and it takes a good deal of cash. So we again ask those whose time has expired to make an effort to renew their subscriptions now—at once—right off—so we can have the wherewithal to pay some bills that are due. We owe some people, other people owe us. If other people will pay us, we can pay some people; and then everybody will be happy. (Quod erat demonstrandum.) It is very unpleasant to be short of funds with a great deal more owed us than we owe, but that is our fix now, and hence this reminder to those who forgot to respond to the notice. We dislike to mention this matter, but Necessity has no fellowship with Squeamishness, and we have to do it. We need the money.

It used to be held by pious people that a bell on a church would drive away evil spirits and hold the lightning in leash. So the priests were in the habit of blessing bells, that they might be thoroughly prepared for their work. The account of the bell superstition forms a very interesting chapter in the history of the church. And the superstition is not dead by any means. On August 4th there was performed at Yonkers, N. Y., a ceremony that is thus described in the World:

"A new bell, known as St. Urban, presented by the Holy Trinity Dramatic Society to the Holy Trinity Catholic church, in Walnut street, Yonkers, was blessed yesterday by the Rev. A. A. Lings, pastor of St. Joseph's church. High mass was celebrated by the Rev. N. M. Reinhardt. The Rev. Francis S. Denes delivered the sermon. Clergymen from all over Westchester county and from this city were present."

In Europe there was a long struggle between the blessed bell and the irreverent lightning-rod, for it was considered blasphemous to carry God's wrathful glances into the ground by means of a wire, but common sense finally won, and we have a suspicion that Holy Trinity, Yonkers, is defended by other agencies than St. Urban and his resonant namesake.

Juvenil prodigies are generally quite numerous in the ministry. Just now two are attracting considerable attention. One is a negro girl, Claretta Nora Avery, at Darlington, S. C. She is nine years old and is preaching at the colored Baptist church to "tremendous congregations, many of whom are white persons."

"Her sermons are remarkable in many respects. Most remarkable and extraordinary from any standpoint under the circumstances. She is self-collected and calm in manner, forcible in speech and gesture. Talks with simple and natural pathos, and speaks with the strongest convictions."

So declares the evidently much impressed Darlington correspondent of the Charleston News and Courier. It is in Missouri, if we are not mistaken, that the other prodigy is to be found. He is a licensed preacher, and a boy of only thirteen years. Volubility is the cheapest of intellectual qualities, if it can be called an intellectual quality at all. There are many who are natural talkers, and whether they talk sense or nonsense depends on something besides the mere ability to utter articulate sounds. They may be parrots or they may be thinkers. To talk fluently and instructively on science one must have deeply studied and critically observed. To talk entertainingly to believers in religion it is not essential that one possess a vast or an accurate knowledge of facts. The Bible story is taken for granted and all that is necessary is to speak with earnestness and the kind of eloquence that appeals to one's congregation. Nothing has to be proved, as the man of reason would have to demonstrate a proposition to a really educated and discriminating audience. Miss Avery "speaks with the strongest convictions." Naturally, for she knows nothing of any other side of the gospel story, is undoubtedly a child of strong feelings, and, believing it to be her "duty" to save souls from hell, has no difficulty in speaking impressively, to the receptive emotions of the believer.

Our Missionary Work.

Several of our good friends have written us that in their opinion the work, "Self-Contradictions of the Bible," should go along with Paine's "Age of Reason" as a missionary pamphlet. Mr. J. R. Perry puts it thus: "As a missionary document the 144 Self-Contradictions will go hand in hand with the 'Age of Reason.' I think any person getting the one will get the other. It is the grubbing process, clearing out the roots and stones, necessary to preparing the soil for good seeds of common sense." And as it is our delight to furnish the implements for this sort of agricultural operations, we are willing to do our part and will send the "Self-Contradictions of the Bible" to those who will distribute it among their Christian friends, FOR A DOLLAR A DOZEN. Or we will send twelve copies to as many different addresses for one dollar.

Now let the friends of Freethought turn to and circulate "Self-Contradictions" as well as the "Age of Reason." Send both books out by the thousand and watch the result. Flood the country with them, and let the Christians know what their holy paper fetish, the Bible, is like and why it is worthless as a guide to any good.

THE TRUTH SEEKER's offer to send eight copies of Paine's "Age of Reason" to eight different addresses for $1, to be used for missionary purposes, is still open. The best results are reported from this method of reaching intelligent believers and giving a new direction to their thoughts.

News and Notes.

After my visit to Stratford-upon-Avon, a few Birmingham Freethought friends gathered at the house of Mr. and Mrs. Armfield for a farewell gathering, hoping that, as the age rolls on, we shall meet again and bivouac on the fields of time, and join forces for further struggle. Mr. Ridgway leads off with an address both of welcome and good-bye, and Mr. Armfield, Robert Taylor, Mr. Cattell, and others, add their hearty good wishes, while the American visitor responds to the best of his ability. It was a joyous occasion, after the inspiration of Shakspeare, to thus realize the universal genius and comradeship of Freethought.

The movement formerly carried on so strenuously by Mr. Watts in Birmingham is sure to make itself felt in future years. My faith is ever in the progress of humanity. After a swift journey, for they can go in England if they only try, I am again in London, and am refreshed with a chat on all the things that interest a Freethinker, from politics and religion, to art and literature, with my friends Foote and Watts. The next day, Thursday, July 25th, I again meet my American friends, Dr. Darrow and Dr. Morton, and we put in the time at Crystal Palace. I find that while I was on my tour, my friends, in usual Yankee fashion, in a little over a week, had visited Scotland, the North of England, and also Paris. I was rather astonished at the rapidity of their course, but being busy professional men, and obliged to return soon, they determined to enjoy as large a glimpse of Europe as possible, and they certainly made the most of every minute. Crystal Palace is one of those places that the traveler must behold, for it contains a vast variety of interesting objects. In art, in science, in history are displays that one could study for months. The varied riches of many countries are here. In the evening, especially, with the myriad lights, the animated crowds, the sparkling waters, the solemn and sprightly music of organ and stringed instrument, and, to wind up, the vast and brilliant rush of fireworks, where every sort of color and fiery particle blazes and sprinkles through the heavens, the Palace is like an enchantment, and, for the time being, we seem to be walking the mazes of romance. It is impossible to describe the thousand-and-one exhibitions that throng upon the view. After this visit to Crystal Palace I have to say good-bye to Dr. Darrow. He leaves the following day for America.

Friday, Mr. J. M. Wheeler takes me to the Tower of London. What a sad history is unfolded here. The heart aches to think of it. How many a bright life has been quenched in these gloomy buildings. Here are the mighty armors of the olden time that once made men invincible. These cumbersome suits appear foolish now. It makes one thankful that he can wear a modern suit of clothes and snap his fingers at these doughty knights, who must have had a hard time of it traveling about in these stupendous habiliments. By the way, all these suits of armor here and elsewhere are very small, showing that the average height and size of man have increased since the Middle Ages. Once in awhile you come across a suit that might do for a six-footer, but very seldom. The modern man in strength, grace, skill, and virility surpasses King Arthur and his famous knights. There is no question but that man to-day is nobler physically than he ever was before. Judging from the armor, the warriors of old were a rather poor lot, and as for the horses they were "slow coaches" indeed. They could not go much above a jog trot, and the jousts of chivalry would be very tame affairs at the present time. The heaviest man was sure to win, merely because of his weight. In this old-time royal residence and prison-house I wander in the chapel built by William the Conqueror, where he himself worshipped. I stand in the dungeons where many a prisoner has pined in agony, and on the spot where the scaffold was erected for the execution of Annie Boleyn, Lady Jane Grey, and other illustrious victims. How cruel and barbarous those times appear whose shadow oppresses us to-day! I can never enter these ghostly buildings, with their record of crime, without a thrill of horror. I can but think of the awful injustice that has existed in the universe. And there seems no help for it. The strong arm has triumphed. History is a perpetual puzzle. God is always a vanishing point, while man is both good and evil, and makes and mars his own destiny. Somehow, out of the everlasting turmoil, we have won the vantage ground. The terrific deeds of the past are no more. In them, however, we see the evolution of man and the annihilation of the deity.

Passing from these dark towers—a huge, strange relic in the bustle and glamour of to-day's civilization, seeming like a great ship stranded on a foreign shore, a wreck of the ages, freighted with the wealth of kings, jewels and crowns, swords and regalis, and the glistening instruments of war—I walk to the Tower Bridge, which arches the Thames near by, in glorious contrast with the ancient palace of kings, a modern structure, built for the people, and not for a despot. It is the noblest bridge over the Thames, with massive towers. Between these swings the enormous drawbridge through which the great ships pass. The traffic over this bridge, as over the London Bridge, is a marvel to those who first see London. One wonders where all the people and the teams and the crowded carriages come from, and would think that the great metropolis was pouring itself into this one highway. Still, if he went to London or Blackfriars Bridge he would find the same vast mass of tidal business.

I must confess there is an occasional stupidity in the English mind that is quite exasperating. Here are the great towers of the bridge, which we are invited to climb to the extent of 200 steps or more, with the expectation that as we pass aloft from tower to tower we shall have an extended view of the Thames and the city. Alas! you are doomed to a disgusting disappointment. Disgust is the only word that can express your feeling when you reach the top to find that you pass from one tower to the other through a closed archway. I was over the bridge before I knew it, and could scarcely believe that I was on the other side until I went back and looked through a few little crevices upon the broad stream beneath. It made me swear a prayer or two to think I had been so thoroughly deceived by the massive stupidity of Anglo-Saxon conservatism. If French or Greek genius had built this lofty highway, it would have been a light and airy structure, through which might be seen vast and glittering prospects of the river and the busy traffic. A noble panorama would have greeted one, instead of this dungeon-like path, through whose crevices you catch the sunlight while you stand on tip-toe, and wonder that the mind which built such a stupendous bridge should crown it with such a solid piece of folly. I say to every traveler, Do not climb the stairs of the Tower Bridge. You will be humbugged if you do. Walk over it, take a good look from the outside, see the great drawbridge rise and the stately ship pass through and the tide of traffic roll on again, and that is all that you can do. The splendid view from the top is shut out by an almost inconceivable blunder.

It is curious what you will see in London at times, a grotesque and yet romantic mingling of art and dilapidation. Just on the verge of Billingsgate—the dirtiest portion of London, I guess—is St. Mary's church on the hill, a humble looking edifice, with an air of desolation in the outward view that would make one think that the inside must be as gloomy as a grave. A change, however, passes over the vision as we enter, for within are perhaps the most exquisite and beautiful carvings in all England—a very gem of art in the slums of London. This church must have been on a favored and fashionable spot to be so nobly decorated, yet in process of time the debris of Billingsgate flowed around its site, and imprisoned its precious ornaments with the environments of poverty. This is an evidence of the vastness of London life and its perpetual changes, like those of the sea itself.

After these wanderings Mr. Wheeler and myself sit down for dinner in the famous Crosby Hall. This is where Richard III received the crown, and within it, in the dining-room and smoking-room, are memorials of the dim and dusty past, paintings, armors, carvings, etc. However, the ghost of the bloody Richard does not disturb our appetite. We eat heartily, and think that kings are no better than common clay, and a crown is a poor bauble compared with a healthy stomach.

Friday evening I am again with Charles Watts and family amidst the greenery of Effra Road. I have the pleasure of meeting Mrs. Butland, of Toronto, and her daughter, Miss Annie Butland, who is a marvelous player upon the piano, bringing forth music with the touch of genius. Our friend has a brilliant future if she chooses an artistic career.

Saturday is my busy day for mail, "News and Notes," etc., for America. But after these labors I wander over to King's Cross and meet my friend Mr. G. W. Foote and spend the evening with him and his family, with Mr. and Mrs. Charles Watts, and Mr. and Mrs. Wheeler, and others. It was delightful to sit out in the garden, on the green sward, with the flowers in perfume and bloom about you, the trees making soft music, the rich sunlight glancing on roof and wall, and making a mellow radiance over the scene; while the children play, and the elders talk philosophy. It was a charming place for thought, for reverie, for imagination. It was one of those resting places for the mind, where we forget the strife of the world, the injustice and falsehoods, and the stern duties that must be met. We rejoice for the moment in the ideal life, and poetry touches our heart with its imperial scepter; as Alexander Smith says, "It clothes us with kingdoms." Our host is not simply the skeptic, the reformer, the warrior, the iconoclast; he is a lover of poetry, in all its moods of glory and of song. Especially is he a student of the supreme and universal Shakspeare, through whose domains he has wandered many a joyous day, and gathered from wide experience the noblest fruitage of the immortal bard. So the evening passes, and music adds its marvel to the occasion, and the soul of Freethought touches the heights of human excellence. It flashes the promethean fire, the forethought of humanity, the glory of the future, the budding of beauty and delight, after the destruction of misery and the wrong.

I am indebted to Mr. Victor Charles Jackson, one of our young Freethought workers in London, for a delightful visit to Canterbury on Sunday, July 28th, when I am for the first time free from the harness. Canterbury is an old and orthodox town. The spirit of the past broods over it. Its cathedral is one of the most ancient in England, and one of the most beautiful and impressive. It indeed charms the eye with its massive yet graceful glory. Its arched roof, its painted windows, its columned aisles present a scene of sweet attraction, mingled though it may be with the superstitions of a dead age. Glorious music was pealing through the vast space as we entered. It was a solemn religious service preparatory to the installation of Dean Farrar, a somewhat advanced theologian, who has just been appointed to the place. I enjoyed the music; the singing was delightful. Some of the voices are the finest in England, for they take especial pains at this cathedral to secure first-rate musical ability; and certainly the music was in harmony with the magnificence of the cathedral. But the formalities of worship, the stiff, artificial ceremonies, the dry prayers; and still drier preaching, did not conduce at all to elevation of mind. They were like a bitter pill which we had to swallow in order to get the real good of the occasion, which was simply in the masterful effects produced by the genius of man in the decorations of the building, in the superb and unmatched beauties of the windows, that flushed with soft yet splendid effulgence that must charm the imagination which delights in color, however critical the mind, and in the waves of music that flowed on and on as if the cathedral itself were a fountain of melody and all its beautiful forms and hues were melting into ethereal joy and splendor.

In the afternoon, in fortunate conjunction with a party of American visitors, and by the courtesy of Mr. Jackson, I had the pleasure of viewing the cathedral under the guidance of Canon Holland, who is a most cultivated gentleman, and who has made a faithful study of the cathedral and its wonderful history. This was the place where Thomas à Becket was murdered. The canon described the scene with dramatic felicity, so that a vivid picture was presented of the theater of the crime. We could see the crowding monks, the heroic prelate, and the relentless knights. We saw the very spot where the stubborn priest received his death wound; where he fell and poured out his life blood upon the pavement. Beneath, in the crypt of the cathedral, we saw the tomb of Becket, and the place where the king, in penance for the murder, received three hundred and twenty stripes upon his bare back. The canon remarked, with a somewhat subtle smile, that here was a case in which the value of penance was displayed, for before the king received the stripes he was defeated on every hand, but when he went forth from the cathedral after the penance, he was greeted with news of victory after victory. He was a lucky king without doubt. As usual, God was on the side of the heaviest battalions, penance or no penance, and the twinkle in the canon's eye meant as much, but I am afraid I didn't apply his logic to the whole case of Christianity.

We saw the tomb of Edward, the Black Prince, and the armor he wore in battle, and the tomb of the king and queen, Henry and Eleanor. I must express my thanks to Canon Holland for his genial politeness, and for the wealth of scholarly information which he furnished of the great cathedral and its centuries of existence.

After visiting the cathedral, we wandered to St. Martin's, which is said to be the oldest church-building in the land. It is indeed an antique structure, and looks as if it might have floated down from the flood. It is situated in the midst of an old cemetery, where wild grasses and flowers flourish over the graves. Services are going on as we approach, and soft and solemn music fills the air. It is said that this was originally a temple of the Druids, built 100 A. D. It afterwards became a place of Roman worship, and then a Christian church in 370 A.D. This is the legend. Whatever may be the facts, the "corridors of time" stretch far away to the foundation stones of this quaint little church, and we need not dispute the story as it is given.

Canterbury is also famous as the place where David Copperfield lived, and I think that David will be remembered as long as St. Thomas à Becket, and with much more delightful associations. "David Copperfield" is to a certain extent an autobiography of Dickens, and on that account is intensely interesting, as so is Canterbury and its surroundings, connected with the genius of the great story teller, who has so much of the wonderful exuberance of Shakspeare. Mr. Jackson, who is an enthusiastic student of Dickens, pointed out the house where Agnes used to sit sewing by the window; and where Uriah Heep used to look forth with his cunning eyes; and also the tavern where Micawber gave his farewell gorgeous banquet, for which he never paid the bill; and there was the butcher's shop, etc. All these things, associated with the immortal story, gave to ancient Canterbury the brilliant light of modern humanity and glorious romance. I shall not forget my excursion to this venerable place and must thank Mr. Jackson for his kindness and generosity.

Monday I have to write "New and Notes" again, but find a pleasant relief after these literary labors in a social reunion at the home of Miss Edith M. Vance and Miss Annie Brown. Our women friends do not fear to put on the harness and work for reform, notwithstanding danger and ostracism. Since I have arrived in England, in many places, in the field work there has been bitter opposition, and but for the protection of policemen there would have been bloodshed and riot. The cruel nature of the Christian religion is thus exposed. In these emergencies we find that woman does not lack in courage and devotion.

On Tuesday, July 30th, I sail with Dr. Morton down the Thames to Greenwich, and visit its museum and hospital and observatory. The voyage along the river is one of constant animation, so varied are the scenes, the vessels, the bridges, the shores, etc. The great hospital at Greenwich extends magnificently on the sight as we approach. In the museum and gallery are the portraits and relics of Nelson, and the melancholy remains of the Arctic expedition under the gallant Franklin. Time forbids a further description.

In the evening, with Mr. Jackson, I visit the India Exhibition, where the great wheel, 300 feet high, rolls around, where there is a most brilliant exhibition of oriental life, its trade, its skill, its art, its wild and luxuriant animal world; its temples of worship, its thousand gods. It was a resplendent scene, ten thousand blazing torches, ten thousand people, bands playing by the dozen almost, beautiful gardens, cascades and flowing waters. One need not travel to India to see its vivid and superb variety of human genius.

Wednesday, "News and Notes" and mail again, and preparatory work for America on return. The Congress of American Freethinkers will be held in New York the last week in October. I want all to come and listen to the story of Freethought in England, and join forces throughout the world.

Wednesday evening I went with Dr. Morton, to the magnificent Royal Aquarium, where music and the drama add their charms to a display of curiosities from every age and clime. I also visit, with Dr. Morton, the "Old Curiosity Shop" of Dickens. It is still standing in the heart of London, a little, crooked building, with old books and papers for sale, pictures of Dickens, relics, etc.

I have to bid farewell this day to Dr. Morton, whom I have found a pleasant American traveler, and I hope to meet him again and Dr. Darrow in the great West of our own country, and talk over our London experiences, which, though but glimpses, are, after all, deep and wide revelations of human life and destiny.

Thursday, with my genial and learned friend Wheeler, who is interested in all that pertains to literature, we visited Chelsea, the home of Carlyle, and the house where he used to live and work, and the garden where he used to smoke and muse. Carlyle has been a great influence in this century, a kind of thunderbolt of reform and sincerity. He was tremendously in earnest, and although he believed in God, he found fault with him also, and muttered: "He does nothing, he is asleep." Though Carlyle could not waken the deity, he did waken man, and set him to thinking and doing. Carlyle was a rugged old fellow, but he wielded the hammer of Thor and made the sparks fly. I plucked some jasmine planted by the wife in the garden. In this case I honor the woman more than the man. She was equally heroic, equally genuine; a woman of fine devotion and splendid nobility of character. I honor Carlyle, but Jane was the better man of the two, and deserves a more shining crown.

Thursday evening I end my week's London experience at the home of Charles Albert Watts, the son of Charles Watts, who is engaged in scientific and Freethought publishing business, is editor of the Literary Guide, etc. Around his hospitable table is Mrs. Watts, his wife, the twin children, and Mr. and Mrs. Charles Watts, who can rejoice in seeing grandchildren gather about them. How old we are getting to be, yet no one would know it by our looks, only by our children, who grow up so fast about our pathway. We spend a delightful evening, and are loth to part when train time arrives, but we cannot afford to be "left"; we must keep up with time and tide.

Friday, August 2d. I start for Paris. What a story I shall have to tell next week!

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

The Cancer of the State.

Gen. Thomas J. Morgan, Commissioner of Indian Affairs, has made some statements in regard to Indian schools which ought to attract public attention.

He makes charges against the Roman Catholic church, but I am unable to see why every charge made against that church will not apply to Protestant churches with equal force. He says: "One of the greatest contests of the ages is now in progress on this continent—the struggle between Protestants and the papacy, between republicanism and despotism."

So far as the struggle between Protestantism and the papacy is concerned, the contest is a matter of indifference to me. If I am to wear the chains of slavery, I care but little whether the links are forged by Catholics or Protestants.

This fight between Protestants and Catholics is simply a squabble over the loaves and fishes. The one is as dangerous to the state as the other; neither can be trusted. Moses Harman is in prison. Is the outrage any the less because it was perpetrated by Protestants? The Protestants boast of the number of Bibles which they distribute each year, and yet they are hounding a poor, one-armed man, J. B. Wise, for sending a small portion of it through the mails.

What difference does it make to me whether I am compelled to pay taxes on Protestant or Catholic property? It is curious that a man of Mr. Morgan's caliber can see that Catholicism is undermining our republic, and yet can see no danger when men are imprisoned for not observing the day set apart by Christians for the worship of imaginary idols. All of these religious sects are despotic and clannish, and Mr. Morgan and his Protestant clan had better get the beam out of their own eyes before they attempt to cast the mote out of the eyes of others.

"In a land of free discussion, such as ours, there should be no limit to debate, and no effort made, by force or other foul means, to arrest the progress made by any sect."

How long is it, Mr. Morgan, since Comstock boasted that all Freethought literature would be "stamped out." Does this look like free discussion? Is Comstock a Catholic? Is not the despotism just the same, whether the stamping is done by Catholics or Protestants?

Were those Catholics who stoned Reynolds and tore down his tent in New Jersey? Were they trying to promote the freedom of discussion? Were the Protestants of Delaware and New Jersey striving to sustain the freedom of debate when they were trying to get Colonel Ingersoll in jail for exercising the freedom of debate which Mr. Morgan says must not be limited?

Mr. Morgan, if there is anyone whom I heartily despise, it is a Janus-faced hypocrite.

This fight between Protestants and Catholics does not involve the question of republicanism or free discussion, but which shall have the management of the "little red school-house." So far as I am concerned, I care but little whether the schools are under the control of the one class of bigots or the other. No matter which party gets control, the Bible will be read, and there will be religious instruction in the schools, regardless of the rights and preferences of all others, and it should never be forgotten that this government was not established in the interest of any class of religionists, or in the interests of gods, ghosts, or redeemers, but in the interests of the whole people of the United States.

"Politics and religion are inseparably blended." Mr. Morgan says this of the Catholic church. Is it not equally true of the Protestant church? Are not politics and religion blended when chaplains are paid out of the public treasury? Are all chaplains Catholics? Are not politics and religion blended when we are compelled to pay taxes on Christian god-houses? Are they not blended when we are compelled to observe the Christian's "holy day" just as he may dictate?

"A sharper contrast cannot exist than that which separates the ideal American republic from the Roman Catholic despotism."

The ideal republic was founded upon the idea that the church and state should forever be kept separate. The members of the convention which framed the Constitution, knowing the aggressive spirit of the church, built a wall around the state to protect it from the buccaneering practices of the church. They declared in the fundamental law that Congress should make no law respecting the establishment of any religion.

Have Protestants never shown a disposition to override the Constitution? Do they not uphold the Comstock law? Was it not passed at the instigation of Protestants? And did it not put power into the hands of one man which the czar of Russia would hardly dare exercise?

When public libraries and public parks are closed, and bands are forbidden to play on the Christian's day, is it not that an exercise of despotic power?

It has never been claimed that these things have an immoral tendency. Then it must be conceded that the suppression of concerts and excursions and innocent amusements is in the interest of the church, and not in the interest of the great body of the people.

"The assault made upon our free institutions is more subtle and veiled in greater secrecy," etc.

Mr. Morgan would have us understand that every act of the Protestants is open, honorable and above board. Was it open and fair to obtain more names to the petition to close the Exposition on Sunday than there were inhabitants in the state where the signatures were obtained? If the Catholics were ever guilty of a more subtle and despicable act, then the fear of hell as a preventive of crime is all a farce.

"The dominant force which has urged on the Catholics has been to augment their power, to extend the influence of the papacy—to make Roman Catholics out of the Indians, and to secure whatever could be secured for the glory of the church."

Mr. Morgan would have us believe that the Protestants are not prompted by any such ambition—that they would not take a dollar from the public treasury and use it for sectarian purposes.

Now let us see what the Protestant churches have drawn from the public treasury in nine years for a single object—the education of the Indians: Presbyterians, $346,120; Congregationalists, $217,269; Episcopalians, $110,166; Friends, $160,557; Mennonites, $29,590; Unitarians, $39,150; Lutherans, $68,580; Methodists, $33,345. Nobody will contend that any of these denominations are Catholics, and yet according to the record, in nine years they have been given from the public treasury over one million dollars for conducting schools among the Indians.

Now is it reasonable to believe that these denominations have not promulgated their various dogmas in the schools under their charge? Just so far as they have used this money to instill their religious doctrines into the minds of the Indian children, just so far has the church and state been united.

But this is not all the money which has been drawn from the treasury in nine years under the pretense of educating the Indian children. The Catholics have drawn out $2,738,571. Then individuals have drawn out vast sums for the same purpose, but always in the interest of some church, for Mr. Morgan says "the Indian office entered into contract with various religious bodies for the education of Indian children in mission or church schools."

All the money which has been given to the various religious societies in nine years, for the education of Indian children, according to the report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, in the aggregate amounts to the enormous sum of $4,277,946. But of this sum the Catholics have drawn more than one half.

Now, why has not some of this money been given to individuals and societies other than religious? Whoever solves this conundrum will come to the conclusion that, whatever the government may be in theory, in practice there is a union of church and state.

I have called attention to only one hole in the skimmer. If all the money which is given to the various churches for pretended benevolent purposes, and all the people pay in taxes on, and for the protection of church property, should be faithfully reported each year, the people would be astounded.

A minister, preaching on the Sunday question, said: "There ought to be a stop put to Sunday excursions, they are robbing the church of its dues." If the government should be administered in the spirit of the Constitution, all such dues would be canceled, and never heard of again.

Here is something which should make the bones of Paine and Franklin and Jefferson rattle in their graves.

The commissioner says: "The schools carried on by the Roman Catholics and other religious bodies were distinctively mission schools, designed chiefly to proselyte the Indians to the peculiar form of religious faith held by each denomination carrying on its work among them." It would hardly be thought that the Commissioner of Indian Affairs would make such an admission, but there it is in black and white, over his own signature, and shows, to a dangerous extent, that the government is under the control of the churches.

This has been going on for years, and these sums have been drawn from the treasury with the full knowledge of the government that they were being used for sectarian purposes.

If the people do not rebel against this amalgamation of church and state, then they ought not to be surprised when they are brought under inquisitorial rule.

Now, it is pertinent to inquire whether this government was established "to promote the general welfare" of the people or to promote the welfare of the churches.

If the people's money can be taxed away from them, and appropriated to religious societies for missionary work, it is time to inquire whether there is any difference between despotism in this country and despotism in Russia.

There can be no more flagrant violation of the spirit of the Constitution than to establish any system of religion by governmental acts. But the government does help to establish a system of religion every time it grants one dollar for religious purposes.

The government is a political institution, and its business is to protect the rights of its citizens and to take none of them away. The church is a spiritual affair—its kingdom is not of this world, and the government can no more take cognizance of its notions than it can of the peculiar notions of the Digger Indians. To take public money and devote it to sectarian purposes is to engender strife among the different sects and nationalities in this country, and is in every sense un-American, and tends only to develop abuses, which all history shows to be inseparably connected with the union of church and state.

It is claimed that these appropriations are made in the interest of good morals. Masonry, Odd-Fellowship, the Sons of Temperance, Good Templars, and many other fraternal societies are said to be moral institutions. But the government has no more right to appropriate the people's money for the upbuilding of these societies than it has to grant money to Buffalo Bill to run his Wild West show.

The aims and purposes of the Constitution are set forth in its preamble in the clearest light:

We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquility, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America.

The government cannot compel people to observe fast days or rites or ceremonies. Whether a man observes the old Jewish Sabbath or the Christian's holy day, or none at all, or whether he works or plays, or goes hunting or fishing, on a given day, is no concern of the government, so long as he does not disturb the peace. And what will not disturb the peace on one day will not disturb it on another. If ringing church bells on Sunday does not disturb the peace, any ordinary labor or recreation will not be likely to do so. Christians must learn that they have no rights under the Constitution not granted in common to all other citizens. Their church property has no more right to be exempt from taxation than theaters or railroad stations.

The American people are bound by acts of Congress, and not by the commands of an imaginary God, supposed to have been given to a half-civilized people three thousand years ago. JOHN PECK.

The National Christian Citizenship League desired to have 100,000 sermons on "national righteousness" preached on June 30th. "National righteousness" means laws compelling observance of the Christian Sunday, and various other kinds of Aunt Nancy legislation.

Observations.

An importer of curiosities has touched our shores with some relics of Waterloo in his possession. They consist of the Duke of Wellington's uniform, together with Napoleon's hat which the great soldier used to talk through, and also the sword that he waved at the head of the army when excited. The importer judged from the Napoleonic revival we have recently sustained that we were ready to pay money to "witness" these accouterments, and was therefore surprised to find that he would have to pay duty on them at the custom house. Very few foreigners understand our protective tariff system. It is doubtless true, as in the case of the desiccated Saint Peregrinus, that neither the McKinley bill nor the Wilson bill has listed old hats and boots, and the reason why they should be taxed and the saints untaxed is therefore inscrutable. An extra session of Congress to revise the tariff in this particular would seem to be desirable, for it is a gross injustice that our domestic manufacture of saints should be laid open to foreign pauper competition, when there ought rather to be a bounty paid for their exportation. Pending such a revision, the owner of the Waterloo relics would save money by combining with the manager of Peregrinus. The appearance of the old saint would be much improved by a Napoleonic hat and Wellington boots, while those articles would, of course, enjoy the immunity from customs duties accorded to other wearing apparel.

This country has not recently heard much of the Rev. Joseph Cook, the Boston lecturer, and a good deal of silent gratitude has doubtless been felt on that account. Since Colonel Ingersoll so happily described Mr. Cook's cult of German metaphysics and New England theology as a combination of sauerkraut and baked beans, it has scarcely been necessary that anything further should be said. But Cook has got himself disliked by the American administration, and so he is again before the public eye. It happened at Honolulu, Sandwich Islands, where the American residents were celebrating the Fourth of July. Minister Willis presided over the event, and there had been an understanding for a fortnight previous that the relations of the Hawaiian government and the United States, being somewhat strained, could not be harped upon without danger of snapping a string. Cook was apprised of the situation, but nevertheless, in the presence of Mr. Willis, he proceeded to roar against the president of this nation with all the noise he was capable of producing. Mr. Willis called him to order, and the whole audience, although no partisans of our esteemed Mr. Cleveland, arose as one man or more, and expressed their condemnation of Cook. The Rev. Sereno E. Bishop, in a letter the New York Independent, describes the occasion as one of great enthusiasm, and says that when Cook left the platform he was not followed by any applause. Bishop is a long resident of Honolulu, where he publishes a paper, and is popular. He will be remembered by American readers as the discoverer of the cause of the red sunsets which excited the surprise of the scientific world some years ago. He says that Cook appeared to be a "big combination of lion and elephant"—an elephant, presumably, on account of his weight, and a lion on account of the skin he habitually wears, though his bray undeceived the populace. It is a fortunate thing for this ramping and snorting declaimer that the world is large, for his presence twice in the same place is never demanded, and if the globe afforded him a more circumscribed range he might shortly find it too small for his feet.

The case of a married couple in Youngstown, Ohio, warns husbands with believing wives that they had perhaps best go to church occasionally although they may have to violate their inclinations in order to do so. A Mrs. Minnear of that city requested her husband on a recent Sabbath morn to accompany her to the house of prayer and worship, but found him obdurate in that respect. She went alone, and returning only to find that he had retired for the night, she touched a match to his bed and had made good progress toward cremating him when he awoke and put out the fire. The couple appeared in court the next morning, where Mrs. Minnear alleged the refusal of her husband to attend church, and the man, apologizing for harsh words used toward his wife, said that "the idea of being burned up made him a trifle angry." I take it that if there were more women with Mrs. Minnear's stern austerity of purpose, and who would rather see their husbands warmed up here than in the great hereafter, there would be a better attendance at some churches. The inhumanity of man concentrated all in self, and woman's devotion touched and made tenderer by the gospel of Jesus Christ, are constantly receiving fresh and striking illustrations.

A New York policeman is the author of a remark worthy the attention of all persons who contemplate suicide on account of the business depression. Arresting an individual seeking euthanasia, this minion of the law inquired, "What do you want to kill yourself for?" "Because," said the man, "the times are so hard I do not care to live." "That," returned the copper, "is a very short-sighted thing to do. For if you go and kill yourself now, what remedy have you to apply when the times get worse?" A man should not recklessly or extravagantly take his only life. He should reserve something to fall back upon in case of extremity.

The tombstone of Professor Huxley has been provided with an inscription reading as follows:

And if there be no meeting past the grave,
If all is darkness, silence, yet 'tis rest.
Be not afraid, ye waiting hearts that weep,
For God still giveth his beloved sleep;
And if an endless sleep, he wills so best.

There is nothing Agnostic about that. If, as Huxley said, Agnosticism means that a man is not to say that he knows or believes that which he has no means of knowing or reason for believing, then the statement that if death is an endless sleep it is because God "wills so best," is one that the professor could not have approved. For anything that we know, God permits the dead to sleep endlessly because he can't help it.

A Disciple paper, the Christian Standard, contains the remark, in the form of a complaint, that "nine-tenths of our young people, if asked why they were Disciples, could not give an intelligent reason for the faith they profess." This growler does not seem to know when things are well enough and to be let alone. As many Bible readers testify, it is quite possible for investigators to inadvertently disprove the very thing they set out to demonstrate, and there is danger that if the young people went to searching for a reason for being Disciples or members of any other sect, they would discover that there wasn't any.

The Scimitar, a Tennessee journal, contends that if the Italian girl, Maria Barberi, who vindicated her honor, and incidentally advertised its loss, by assassinating the man to whom she had voluntarily surrendered it, had lived in a Southern or Western state she would now be at liberty, instead of in prison and under sentence of death. That is probably true as regards some of the states in the sections named, but it is not all of the truth. The rest of that mighty and ever-uppermost commodity is that if the woman had been a resident of those parts where the Scimitar's sentiments prevail, a party of chivalrous gentlemen calling themselves Whitecaps or Regulators would have tarred and feathered her before she had lived with Cataldo for two months; and she could have preserved herself from that fate only by killing her paramour before the Committee on Morals arrived. The custom of honoring romantic murderers, and that of mobbing and flogging such persons as attend strictly to their own business, may be classified as products of the same uncultivated soil.

Although editor of the London Agnostic Journal, Saladin (or W. Stewart Ross) is not himself an uncompromising Agnostic. In answering a correspondent he says: "We, too, in certain aspects, incline to be gnostic, not so much with an evidential as an intuitional gnosticism." The total depravity wherein I rejoice to have been born instigates me to inquire in what respect, if any, "intuitional gnosticism" differs from what is conceived as subjective illumination; to what extent, if at all, it resembles inspiration, and whether it is not, as a matter of fact, the same thing as the operation of the holy spirit. Does it or does it not confirm the verity of what is known to be untrue? If it does, the foundation of a new religion is discovered.

Last Chance to Obtain a Rare Book.

David Friedrich Strauss's "Life of Jesus Critically Examined" was first published in two volumes for $9. The edition ran out, and another was issued in one volume for $4.50. This edition is almost exhausted, less than fifty copies being in existence. Of what are left we have obtained a share, and can furnish them postpaid at the last price, $4.50. They will not last long, and we advise those of our friends who want a copy to send at once. When these are gone there will be no more to be had. This edition is translated from the fourth German edition by George Eliot, and contains 784 large octavo pages of solid reading, very clearly printed. It is unnecessary to say to students that this is a very valuable work, one which the church wishes had never been written, but which it cannot controvert.

Prof. James H. Cook.

It becomes our melancholy duty to record the death of Prof. James H. Cook, of Columbus, Kansas, an oftentimes contributor to these columns, and for very many years an untiring worker in the cause of Freethought. He committed suicide by drowning on the morning of Wednesday, August 14th. For a long time he has been a severe sufferer from a complication of diseases of the eliminating organs, greatly aggravated by his extreme nervous sensitiveness and his habit of morbid introspection. He felt that his services during his working years entitled him in the decline of life to a greater degree of recognition than he received, and he was keenly stung by his poverty, and what he thought were the slights of his comrades. He was of a delicate, refined nature, alive in every fiber of his being to all that was beautiful in the cosmos and in art, and, as a consequence, vulnerable to the attacks of all that was ugly and cruel, wherever found. He was a diligent student of human character, and it was one of his delights to analyze the mental and moral organizations of men and women, either after personal examination or through correspondence.

Mr. Cook was a lover of liberty, championing the cause of the enslaved and oppressed everywhere. Only once, so far as the knowledge of the writer of this extends, did he lose sight for a time of the fundamental principle, and that was when his intense loathing of intoxicants and tobacco led him to temporarily ally himself with the Prohibitionists. He antagonized slavery in his youth and later won the hatred and incurred the persecution of the church and Mrs. Grundy for his devotion to mental and social freedom. We hope to be able at a later day to give our readers something of the history of his early struggles. His many friends, scattered from New England to the Pacific, will, we are sure, be glad of such a record, incomplete though it must be.

Dr. F. A. M. Cook, who sends us the particulars of the death of Professor Cook, says that he had attended the Old Settlers' meeting on August 2d, and came home very much exhausted. He took cold and later had a heavy chill. Subsequently he was better, as Dr. Cook thought. When a friend who had called to see him shook hands with him at parting and said, "I hope, Mr. Cook, you will be better the next time I see you," he replied, "You had better wish I would be dead." (He often said something like this under similar circumstances.) When his friend protested against his talking so despondingly, he asked "What is the use of living and suffering so?" That evening other friends called and he directed Dr. Cook to give them copies of newspapers, thus manifesting his interest in reform work to the last. He declined to have anyone sit up with him that night. When Dr. Cook went over later he had gone to bed. When she called in the morning with hot water to make him lemonade, she glanced in at the window and saw a paper lying in his chair. As she reached the door she saw the words "watering hole." A second glance showed that the bed was empty. At the watering hole, a pool only about two and a half feet deep, she found him dead. He had taken the rope from the water pail, tied a stone to each end, and placing the rope across the back of his neck, had thrown himself face downward into the pool. Careful of others to the last, he had taken off his shirt to prevent its getting soiled, and placed it, with his vest, in his trunk. In the pocket of the vest was the money for his cremation fees, and his final instructions. He had written his farewell to Dr. Cook the evening before, or very early that morning. Everything had been done with the greatest apparent deliberation and forethought.

Dr. Cook had the body embalmed, went with it to St. Louis, and it was reduced to ashes in the crematory there, in accordance with the long expressed wish of the reformer.

James H. Cook was born in East Hampton, Connecticut, March 12, 1819.

Dr. Cook wishes to extend her thanks to all the friends who assisted her in carrying out the wishes of the deceased, and to his correspondents she begs to say that as soon as she feels able she will endeavor to attend to unanswered correspondence. The last words in her letter were: "I am more in favor of cremation than ever."

The end has come. His sufferings are over. He lived a thinker and humanitarian. He died a philosopher. In his life he struggled toward grander heights. It is for us to carry forward, so far as we are able, the work to which he contributed all that he had to give. On his urn we place the tribute of our respect.

Kansas Liberals Meet.

The Fifth Annual Convention of the Kansas Freethought Association was held in Forest Park, Ottawa, August 6th to 11th, inclusive, 1895. The popular meeting-place for Kansas people is the beautiful park on the Marias des Cygnes. There was good speaking and fair weather, and all had a gloriously delightful time.

Mrs. Etta Semple's address of welcome was received with interest and attention. It was followed by D. W. Hull with a fitting address, "The Object of Freethought Organizations and the Effect of Unity." C. V. Williams lectured on the "Conflict Between Reason and Religion." A very pleasing and well-written paper by Miss Laura Knox, on "Secular Sunday-schools," was received with great interest. Samuel Carter spoke on "Liberal Funerals." Other speakers were E. Z. Ernst, James Pontius, Alexander Rose, F. W. Cotton, and J. W. Adams.

A very interesting debate was had on the subject, "The Efficacy of Prayer and its Effects on Humanity," by Rev. J. H. Lathrop and ex-Adjutant-General H. H. Artz. Both are good speakers. The best of feeling was shown throughout by the speakers, and the audience was attentive and admiring.

Letters from persons who could not attend were read by the president, Etta Semple. Damon Higbee, J. H. Cook, E. M. Macdonald, A. Warren, Mary Tillotson, W. S. Bell, and Moses Harman were among those who wrote.

Sunday evening we were given a closing address by J. F. Oliphant.

The following resolutions were adopted:

Resolved, That Congress, in passing what is known as the Comstock law, has exhibited a profligate use of the power in it vested, has overstepped the bounds of reason and propriety.

That this act, which we most heartily condemn, brands useful information as obscene, prevents the spread of knowledge that would elevate all humanity, and increases and protects ignorance by law.

That this power, vested in Congress, if as recklessly used in future as in the past, will in the near future either enslave the people of the nation or destroy the government.

Resolved, That we, members of the Kansas Freethought Association assembled in convention at Ottawa, do extend to our brother and past secretary, Moses Harman, our sincere and heartfelt sympathy. That while we feel our helplessness to aid him against such a powerful influence as the law which holds him, yet we can remember him and sympathize with him, and we will put forth every effort to eradicate this growing evil, and thereby save other brothers and sisters from like fate.

A short quotation from J. F. Oliphant's speech:

Theology has sought with sword and flame to blight and blast the purest things of earth. Freethought has sought with argument and reason to fill the world with light and love; to gild the fleeting hours with gold, and to heap upon the hearts of men the priceless boon of joy. Freethought taught the valued lesson that opposition in thought is as essential to felicitous government as competition is necessary to the purity of the trades. Freethought was the parent of science; theology could not have been, for theology has boundary lines. Freethought has none. The religious say, "Thus far shalt thou go and no farther." Freethought says, "To the stars and beyond!"

True science has no such unknown quantity as faith; it either knows or does not know. It will not acknowledge a heaven that is built upon the sands of "promises," until it has seen the glitter of its throne, touched its Jasper walls, or heard the rustle of an angel's wing.

Officers of the Kansas Freethought Association: Etta Semple, president, Ottawa; first vice president, Samuel Carter, Asherville; second vice-president, Isaac Farley, Melvern; secretary and treasurer, Geo. W. Jones, Everest; state lecturers, James Pontius, Washington; Alexander Rose, Lawrence; Isaac Farley, Melvern; Samuel Carter, Asherville; Miss Laura Knox, Portland. The next annual meeting will be held in the full of the moon, August, 1896, at a place to be selected by a committee of seven.

Geo. W. Jones, secretary.

General Sherman and the Chaplains.

General Sherman, says Harper's Weekly, was not one of the silent generals, like Grant and Von Moltke. He had the gift of communicating his sentiments, both orally and in writing, and he had sentiments on many subjects which he was very ready to communicate. Whatever fault any one might find with sentiments that he expressed, it was seldom that there was occasion to complain that he failed to make himself understood, or cloaked his convictions with obscure or euphemistic language. The following letter, written while he was general of the army, is interesting, both as an example of his official epistolary style, and on account of its subject matter:

"MY DEAR SIR: Yours of July 24th is received, and if your brother, the Rev. ———, of Illinois, will make his application to the secretary of war for a chaplaincy in the army, and send me his papers, I will indorse and lay them before the secretary for the action of the president, who alone always makes these appointments.

"I never give original letters to the president or secretary of war, because it would be wrong for me to do so, as they might refer several applicants to me for selection, and I would seem to be committed to the one holding my letter. I think there are several hundred applicants now, each one of whom is stronger in the faith than St. Paul, and most of whom, before appointment, are anxious to be martyrs; but once appointed and confirmed they object to our frontier posts because they are ill adapted for raising a large family of small children.

"Of course the whole system is now a farce and meant to be so. If Congress wanted the army to have the influence of religion, it would allow the commanding officer of each post remote from civilization to hire and pay for a minister while employed, like surgeons. Of such posts there are nearly a hundred, whereas the chaplains are limited to thirty, say half of whom are sick, or don't like the isolation of Texas, Arizona, etc. Of course there are no vacancies now, and they are gobbled up as soon as the telegraph announces a death—there are no resignations—and so greedy are the applicants that they will not even wait for the funeral.

"If your brother wants to join in this scramble to become a martyr, let him send me his papers, and I will see they are filed; and then let him have some Senator or member of Congress to rush to the president the moment he learns a chaplain is 'in extremis.' Very truly yours,

"W. T. SHERMAN, General."

Insulting His "Cloth."

The New York Sun of Aug. 19th tells this instructive little story:

Father Ducey of St. Leo's Roman Catholic church and an Atheist had a discussion concerning religion outside the West Thirtieth street police station last night, at the conclusion of which the priest, after he had soundly berated his adversary, jumped into his carriage and drove away.

It was shortly after 10 o'clock when the priest drove to the station house to compliment Captain Pickett on the manner in which he was enforcing the exorcise law.

After leaving the captain the priest stopped to talk with some reporters who were outside listening to the singing of the colored congregation of a church across the street.

While Father Ducey stood there a well dressed, elderly man, who had been asking Sergeant Lane some question, emerged from the station house and stopped beside the priest to listen to the singing.

Some one remarked that the Negroes were very enthusiastic in their form of worship.

"All religion is nothing more than enthusiasm," remarked the new comer.

"Why do you say that when we have such master minds as Cardinal Newman who believe otherwise?" retorted Father Ducey.

"Talking about master minds," answered the elderly man, "how about Alexander von Humboldt?" at the same time shaking his finger in Father Ducey's face.

Father Ducey seized hold of the man's wrist and shoved his arm aside, demanding, in an angry tone, what he meant by assuming a threatening attitude.

"You have insulted my cloth, sir," said Father Ducey, "and I have a mind —"

Seeming suddenly to recover his self-possession the priest walked quickly to his carriage. As he entered it he turned and said: "I am a member of the church militant."

"Oh!" answered the gray-bearded man, "I did not know you were a clergyman. Anyway, one would never think so, judging from your language."

The sentence was lost on Father Ducey, who by this time was whirling through Thirtieth street in his carriage.

The elderly gentleman was mistaken in one particular—the language of Father Ducey was eminently clerical. The priest, no matter to what church he adheres, cannot bear contradiction or free expression, and is always tempted to bluster, although he often nowadays finds it unprofitable to show what he really feels; in this instance Father Ducey's prudence put a check upon his temper at the critical moment.

"Religion's Unusual Effect" is the head that the World puts on a dispatch from Pine Bluff, Arkansas, telling how Jesse Isborg, a Negro, became crazed by religion at a revival meeting, prayed all night, and in the morning shot his landlady at the breakfast table, mortally wounding her, and finished his career by blowing out his own brains. Why did the World put such a misleading head on the dispatch? What is there "unusual" in the spectacle of a man driven crazy by religion?

Scattering Seeds of Truth.

PARKERSBURG, W. VA., Aug. 5, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Please find $1 for "Age of Reason" and "Self Contradictions of the Bible," about the same number of each. Wishing the truth seekers all good health,
Yours very truly, LEONARD WALTERS.

He Proves That He Likes It.

BURLINGTON, IA., Aug. 14, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $2 for "The Field-Ingersoll Discussion," "The Ingersoll-Gladstone Controversy," and "Myth and Miracle." The remainder you can credit to the Wise Defense Fund.

My paying for THE TRUTH SEEKER two years in advance, as I did a short time ago, shows that I appreciate it. I subscribe for quite a number of papers and magazines, but always read THE TRUTH SEEKER first, and I think Heston's pictures are simply immense.
WILBUR MOSENA.

He Reads it Through Each Week.

THORNBURG, IA., July 29, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $2.50. Please apply $1 to defend Brother Wise and liberty, as I see by THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 20th that more money will be needed to establish the most simple principles of justice when religion is involved in a controversy. For the rest, please send me "Geological Sketches at Home and Abroad," and "Charles Darwin: His Life and Work."

Keep right on with your great work. THE TRUTH SEEKER is the only paper I can find time to read through each week.
E. D. NAUMAN.

The Car Is Rolling On.

FREDONIA, N. Y., Aug. 15, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $2. Paine's works are being read here and sent for as never before. No falsehood, by whatever name called, or covered by the myths of ages, but sooner or later must yield to the all-powerful truth that is so rapidly coming up the steep of time. The engine of science and truth is on the track. It is surely and swiftly moving toward the goal of humanity, the universal brotherhood of the races.

One dollar of the inclosed is for the "Field and Ingersoll" and "Gladstone and Ingersoll" debates, "Myths and Miracles," and "Crimes of Preachers."

Thinks That He Is Good, but Young.

KIRKSVILLE, MO., Aug. 10, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose $4 to renew my subscription to your paper, and for the book, as proposed in your liberal offer to those who renew. The regular price would have been satisfactory, and I would have remitted just as quickly. I have previously ordered several copies of the book, but have disposed of them. I have been at Monroe, Iowa, visiting a brother, and have just returned; that is the reason I have not remitted sooner. While at Monroe I listened to a lecture by Franklin Steiner, which was superb, although coming from one so young. Mr. Steiner is already widely known, and, if he lives and remains in the Liberal field, will be more extensively known in the future.

At the Grave of W. R. Bachelor, Jr.

Aug. 15, 1895.

FRIENDS: I undertake the painful task of speaking a few words at the final resting place of my son. What shall I say of death? It is birth; it is life. It is the inexorable law of nature. Every moment a man is born; every moment one dies. A few years ago we were not; a few years hence and all now living will be gone. Do you ask me what becomes of the intelligence, loves, hopes, fears, of the dead? My answer is: Where is motion when the wheels stop, or the light when the candle is blown out? All in nature—all in the universe. The tearful eyes of millions follow loved ones to that curtain that has never been lifted.

Then, we all have to die, for nature's laws are unalterable. She seems to "create man without purpose, and destroy him without regret." Thus I fail to see any special providence, or the execution of any divine will. Prayers and supplications can have no effect on the laws of fate.

He that is before you—the fell hand of a wasting disease (consumption) was laid upon him in the days of his manhood. He lingered many months with the certainty of death before him. He belonged to no church—he was a Freethinker. He never murmured in his long illness, but met death with calmness and without fear. He was conscious to the last. A short time before he passed away he called me and told me he was dying. And thus he passed away and now rests. He was a filial son, a loving brother, a true friend. He stood for truth and right. We now leave him in the arms of mother earth. Among birds and flowers, green fields, babbling brooks, and the golden sunshine.

Farewell—a long farewell.

DR. W. R. BACHELOR.

Some Suggestions for the Brethren.

GREENVILLE, OR., Aug. 7, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I read the paper every week and enjoy it very much, especially Observations and News and Notes, which take me back to the old days of Freethought, of which I have an almost complete file.

I write merely to give the churchmen a practical idea, and realizing the superiority of a diagram to mere written description, I ask Heston to illustrate it.

In driving into Hillsboro one day, I noticed that all the steeples on the churches were shaped like a speaking trumpet such as firemen and sailors use to make themselves heard in the midst of great turmoil. Now, if the churchmen wanted to hear the voice of the almighty, the steeples are all right, but the most of the prayers are appeals to "him" to do something for us, and as very little seems to be done it is just possible that in the din created by the Catholic and A. P. A. love feasts, cyclones, steam-whistles, dynamos, holiness ranters, and the like, that the supplications do not reach the ear of divinity at all. If we are to keep building churches and wish to realize the greatest amount of good attainable, let us turn the steeples "together" end up, make the "bell" a little bigger, put the "mouthpiece" close to the pulpit and carefully follow the known laws of acoustics, and then if the "Thorne of Grace" is ever to be reached by an appeal from us poor critters, we will have the inside track on the effete and non-progressive old world where the churches are old and held in such veneration that they would not dare to try to remodel them.

As the bell being directed upward will catch a good deal of rain-water here in Webfoot, it (the water) could be turned into the baptismal font by a simple gate, and that alone would save enough in a short time to pay for the extra work.

Yours for utility and convenience,

THOS. S. WILKES.

Mr. S. J. Fleckten.

LEXINGTON, KY., Aug. 15, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: We are living on the outskirts of an ancient régime, or period, which was consistent within itself but which lost its great power through many defects.

We are now left without restraint, wild and uncivilized, but the holy cuttle-fish religion is as strong as ever, its slimy arms wound tightly around the public schools and the children who attend them.

These children are willing proselytes, stolen from their parents to all intents and purposes; a helpless credulity supposed to be a part of their nature. This ignorant faculty is termed "reverence" in later years.

Mr. Fleckten does not boast of anything of the kind. He is the prophet who has arisen in our Israel, who has brought to a crisis the evils of the school situation, characterized by suspense, deceit, misery, intrigue, and imposition.

The mass of the people have remained inactive, while religious exercises were conducted in our public schools, the fiend Fanaticism, also, corrupting the moral atmosphere which we breathe.

At this critical moment comes into the arena this true man, armed with the principle "Sink or swim, live or die, I am for liberty of thought," his noble children echoing the same sentiment.

A slow, temporizing policy will not eradicate great evils. Said Washington, "We must erect a standard, to which the people can always repair with safety." The great orthodox leaders, who capture the young, are slaves to their party marble statues, without progressive thoughts or noble pity for the world. How would they appear beside Condorcet and Voltaire.

Respectfully,

ALHAZA.

The Olla Podrida of Astronomy and Theology.

SANTA CRUZ, CAL., Aug. 7, E. M. 295.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed $5, to renew my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER for two years.

I would like to know if some Christian scholar can tell the meaning of the following language:

The Lord delighteth not in any man's legs, neither hath he pleasure in the strength of a horse.

Our God is a consuming fire.

And when the devil had ended all the temptation, he departed from him for a season.

I will rend the caul of their heart, and there will I devour them like a lion.

For I will tread them in mine anger and trample them in my fury, and their blood shall be sprinkled upon my garments, and I will stain all my raiment. For the day of vengeance is in mine heart, and the year of my redeemed is come.

It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God.

What is meant by the seven eyes in God-all-mighty's forehead? The seven stars in J. Christ's right hand? The seven golden candlesticks? The seven vials of wrath? The seven seals of prophecy? The seven gifts of the spirit? The seven deadly sins? or any other of the seven holy or unholy things which we find always so ingeniously contrived to set the brains of religious people at sixes and sevens? I do believe that the whole affair of which they speak and preach, and which is called gospel, has no reference at all to any persons that ever existed, or events that ever occurred upon earth, but is astronomical. The author of "The Diegesis," Rev. Robert Taylor, D. D., said it is all to be seen and is all exhibited in the visible heavens; and so it is indeed. "I set my affections on things above, not on things on earth;" that is, "I set my understanding and apprehension on the great principles of astronomical science. I do not believe that Jesus Christ and his apostles were persons that ever existed upon earth. The Bible, in the historical sense which the Christian clergy put upon it, is the language of idiosyncrasy or of stark, staring madness; but it rises into grandeur and astonishing wisdom and truth when read in its astronomical significance.

Hence, the sun speaks that sublimely allegorical and most correctly astronomical language: "I am the resurrection and the life. He that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live, and whosoever liveth and believeth in me shall never die." Thus the sun pledges to us, not the foolish dream of the immortality of man, but the philosophical truth of the eternity of nature.

Anti-Missionary Vaccination Wanted.

LEAVENWORTH, KAN., Aug. 11, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: The killing of missionaries in China is merely an exchange of the religious compliments of the season. A few hundred Chinamen having been killed one time and another by the Christians in this country, it was getting high time that our imitative pagan neighbors should return the courtesy. They have been slow catching on, however, and are away behind in the count. The Christians are the best butchers, ten to one. Take notice what a dandy job they did at Rock Springs, Wyo., a few years ago. They massacred a whole colony of unarmed pagans (nearly one hundred) in less than an hour, and licked their chops for more. And our "Christian government" did not punish the bloody fiends either. But "all the same" the Christians now demand that our government must declare war against China if she does not ferret out and behead the slayers of the missionaries. That is different. No forgiveness; no turning of the other cheek. Turkey for Christian, crow for pagan. A fair sample of Christian justice.

The missionaries should stay at home. They force themselves into communities against the wishes of the entire population. They decoy the young and poison their minds against their parents' religion, thus becoming a public nuisance. This is infamous. It enrages parents, and the "mission" is hated and detested worse than a pest-house or a leper's den. That the "pagans" have endured the infliction so long and so patiently as they have speaks volumes for their good breeding and toleration, which is infinitely superior to that of the Christian.

The very act of sending "missionaries" there, as though they were savages, is an insult to the nation and to the people. Religious propagandism is extremely abhorrent to them. It is never practiced by Oriental religions, being considered a gross breach of the rules of etiquette. It is a vice peculiar to Christianity, or more likely a contagious disease. May we hope that some one may discover a way to vaccinate against it?

A Freethought Hall.

Aug. 15, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Iowa has another Freethought hall. It has been erected through the generosity of Mr. James Hart, of Monroe. While not of monster dimensions, and wanting in the touches of a Michael Angelo, it is of ample size for the community in which it is situated, and is a thing of beauty in addition. Several years ago Mr. Hart attempted to buy a lot for the purpose in the town of Monroe, Jasper Co., Ia. Such a storm was raised against the plan that persons owning land asked him twice as much as a lot was worth. The advocates of "Peace on Earth" threatened to burn such an edifice in case it was constructed. Not intending to be foiled, our friend determined to build it on his farm about a mile from town, and there it stands. Though not a regular carpenter, Mr. Hart sawed every board, and drove every nail. On Friday, August 2d, it was ready for dedication. The interior had been well furnished with chairs, two tables, and an organ. Mr. Wm. Hart, of Kirkville, Mo., brother to James Hart, came up to assist us. He is well known as the author of "The Candle From Under the Bushel," and his activity in the work of Liberalism dates from many years ago. At eight o'clock in the evening the people began to arrive, and in a short time the road was filled with the buggies and wagons of those who had come from a distance. The hall was soon filled, and when I began to speak we had more people outside than inside, and still they came. The most sanguin of the Liberals expected only a moderate attendance, but they were happily disappointed. We had lectures in Monroe before, but they were poorly attended, and the Christians called them a failure. They could not say that this time. I must relate an amusing incident. When Mr. Hart first went to the hall in the morning, he found lying at the door a monstrous iron bomb, sixteen inches long and three and three-fourths inches in diameter. It was well made, and had evidently been put together by a mechanic. Two fuses on one end were nearly burned away, and a black circle on the step was the result. Matches were also found. It looked formidable, and was, doubtless, as strong an argument as could be offered, but it turned out to be like all other Christian arguments—harmless. When Mr. Hart opened it he found the contents to be half straw and half mud—two splendid representatives of the Christian religion. No doubt the person who placed it there would much rather it had contained dynamite, and he only showed what he would like to do if he could. The name of the hall is "The Oak Park Institute." It will be open for the discussion of all questions pertaining to the good of mankind, and particularly for Freethought lectures. Let us hope that we may see many more buildings of the kind all over the United States.

No "American Sabbath."

CHARLESTON, S. C., Aug. 10, 295 E.M.

MR. EDITOR: Without any idea it would reach its columns, but on principle I sent the following letter to the World some time ago.

Possibly not brief enough, perhaps a little too pronounced, may be unsatisfactory otherwise, at any rate I am not aware its finality was other than the waste basket.

Fatuous Protestantism seems quite in a way to overreach itself and is acting the willing catspaw to astute and chuckling Catholicism!

But Catholic chestnuts (roasted or unroasted) are not to our eclectic liking—however accommodating our Protestant friends—and, "the burnt child dreads the fire," I think, still carries a searching moral.

LOUIS LEVINE.

SUNDAY "SABBATH!"

Editor New York World: The World moves to impress the truth that facts are stubborn things; the theory that attempts to ignore them insures its early destruction.

In a press report dated Boston, July 14th, is this item:

"Dr. Arthur Little, of Dorchester, presided at a meeting upon Sabbath observance, held this afternoon at Park Street church, which was well filled with Christian Endeavorers. In opening the speaking, he said it was the duty of the Republic to see that the Lord's Day was well kept."

"Dr. Page, of Leavenworth, Kan., pleaded for the Puritan Sabbath in the West, where he said Sunday was a holiday. Many Sabbath breakers were from families formerly worshiping in Park Street church."

Here is news! Here is a glorious chance for your state religion. Here is an opening for that much desired (by certain religionists) government department of religion (creedless?) to expound the contradictions of the scriptures, the incapables to decide the meum et tuum of the people's dearly-bought, perhaps too carelessly prized, liberties! Here is a Mafia-dagger for Religious Liberty's fair form! And here is the kind of an American that would loose the blood-hounds of religious proscription!

For a "religious" body to make the plea, it is rest (whatever that facile word may be made to mean), when they care not a fig more for "rest" than they do for the outraged principle, is palpably dishonest and immoral, and yet such a body poses as an immaculate "I-am-holier-than-thou!" and actually believes (amazing!) people are such consummate addle-pates as not to detect the ill-disguised hypocrisy.

"Religious clauses" of any description that would control in any matter of mooted opinion and belief, are every one relics of colonial enactments; and with the 4th of July, 1776, for Americans, became mere barnacles on the American ship of state, which it is becoming quite evident now, should be struck away ere the safety and the sailing qualities of the glorious craft be seriously impaired.

There is no "American Sabbath" that we hear ad nauseam, in the sense that the government may have anything to do with any holy day of any religion, that it may deny liberty by enforcing a hybrid law that is expected to and does give to one body of citizens of one faith a privilege it would deny to any other.

Holidays are for "rest and recreation," and are deservedly popular, and these alone come into the state's purview.

There is a higher question than that of "beer" involved! It is a fundamental American principle that is challenged. The sooner the people awake to the latent possibilities for danger in any compromise, the sooner will the question of the total separation of the religious and secular interests—the absolute divorce between church and state—be definitely and forever settled.

Let the World champion this distinctive Americanism and see that justice is done, that the main contention be unobscured!

Has God a Soul Factory?

MONTEREY, TENN., July 21, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I am very much pleased with Mr. Pikard's intellectual autobiography. It may seem strange, but my experience was almost identical with his up to the time I left the church. After passing my final examination for the ministry, and after completing all the preliminary arrangements for my ordination, I severed my connection with both ministry and church. The soul problem is one that has occupied my attention for many years.

I said to myself, "What evidence is there to prove that man possesses a dual nature?" I read, and read, and sifted, and I am still reading and sifting, and all the evidence I have accumulated points the other way. The subject presented itself in this light to me: When a young couple get married, and the female conceives and brings forth a child, every act connected therewith is a natural act. Can a natural act produce a spiritual substance? Reason says No. Then, if nature, in her multifarious, intricate and wonderful workings, can not produce a soul, there is but one other way a soul could be brought into existence, and that would be by special creation by some almighty power. What kind of direct evidence have we in our possession that tends to demonstrate to us that we are immortal? None whatever. If there be an almighty being, his most essential attribute must be justice. Does such a being exist? If he has a soul factory in the seventh heaven, he must know the destiny of each soul manufactured there. Not only so, but he must also determine, prior to its leaving the heavenly factory, to what womb, family, and country each soul must be transferred. Here is a family of learning, wealth, refinement, and conspicuous morality. The wife gives birth to a beautiful daughter. It is loved, cherished, and trained in all things calculated to make it happy. It takes the good path through life. Doing good to others affords it boundless pleasure. It knows no evil, for it has never been permitted to witness one single scene of wickedness during its existence on earth. This child dies, say, at the age of thirty, and goes straight into Abraham's bosom. Here is another family, living in one of the lowest slums on earth.

This wife also brings forth a daughter. It is trained from its infancy in crime and immorality, in order to furnish an adequate income for its degraded parents. This child also lives thirty years, but during all these years it never knew one moment's honest pleasure, and, in a fit of melancholy, it ends its earthly existence by the poison route. The orthodox God, being omniscient, omnipresent, omnipotent, just, and munificent, made these two souls, sent one on its mission of pleasurable and ecstatic delight, which commenced here and will never end, and the other was sent on its mission of misery, pain, intensified suffering, and eternal agony. Where is his justice? The cruel, brutal, and blood-thirsty character of the Jewish God is well portrayed in 2 Samuel xxiv. This chapter shows him to be the most unjust and infamous monster that ever existed. He first of all prompts David to number the people, then gets mad at David for executing his own order. It was David that committed the crime, if crime it was, but there were 70,000 innocent men who were barbarously massacred for David's crime. Where is God's justice?

I was much amused at the description of Mr. White's menagerie. His bills announcing its arrival are incomplete. The prison Peter was incarcerated in, the aprons Professor Paul made fly out of the bodies of his patients, the jawbone of the jackass with which Samson slew his thousands, a wheel off the chariot Enoch soared to heaven in, the giant's bed that was only 16 feet 4 inches long and 7 feet wide; the pillars Samson pulled out when he committed suicide, a sample of the eyes the Philistines wore when they took a peep through the roof, through the people below, and the ground floor, when they got their last glimpse of Samson; the log shanty where Samson saw the harlot, and a few of the foxes Samson tied together. My dears, there are many more curiosities not yet mentioned, but if you will look to the right, you will see nothing; look to the left, you will observe the same; look before, it is still there; look behind, there is still no change; but if the juveniles, when they crawl under the canvas, will only keep their eyes open, they may see some of the lice Aaron created when he worked his ten miracles. In connection with this lice business, Moses did not give the Egyptian magicians a fair show. Aaron had already used up all the dust there was in the country, so there was none left out of which the magicians could make lice. If they failed, it was because there was no dust left. If Aaron had taken hold of a chunk of nothing, and had made his lice from it, then he might have claimed a victory over the magicians, but as it was, the magicians were asked to do something that Aaron had not done. No, no, Aaron, this won't do. Give the magicians a fair show.

JOHN PRITCHARD.

An Address to the Doubters.

SPRINGFIELD, NEV., Aug. 15, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: O ye of little faith, know ye not, therefore, that in olden time there went forth a great warrior conquering cities and laying waste great countries, and the people marvelled greatly, saying, "Verily, verily, Joshua is a great general!" And it came to pass that the "virgin despoiler," in his many peripatations up and down the "vale of tears," allowed Joshua to have many and divers seances with his nibbs, and thus they stood pat.

Know ye not also that his armies were marshaled to the music of the most noted and world-renowned bands of that or any other age? Not even was Gilmore's circumstance.

Its leader, Gideon, was the greatest band-master east or west of Jordan, because, forsooth, he could blow a ram's horn to a finish. Ye shouldst know also that Gabriel as a ram's hornist was not in it even a little bit.

Verily, verily, I say unto you marvel not at his greatness, for even unto this day no man bloweth a ram's horn like unto Gideon. Now there was in that land (a Sabbath day's journey west of Jordan) a great and flourishing city, whose king was not warlike, neither were the people; nay, much more, but were so peace-loving that they continually cried out, saying, "You can play in my back-yard."

Then saith Joshua (the son of Nun) to the centurions and multitude of soldiers, "Be thou strong and of good courage, prepare thou 'grub,' for although Jordan is a hard road to travel, thou shalt within three days pass over it and to the city of Jericho." And they answered, saying, "All that thou commandest us we will do, and whithersoever thou sendest us will go, even though it be over the 'great divide.' As we did to Moses on the east of Jordan so will we stay with thee toward the setting sun." Then said Joshua, the son of Nun, "The city of Jericho must become a prey to us that we may overthrow it, and despoil the people thereof. Howbeit," saith Joshua, "it has a great non-scalable wall by which they hope to save themselves, their cattle and their asses." Then answered the centurions and the multitude of soldiers, saying, "Woe unto the people thereof, if ye have seance with the great 'virgin despoiler.'" Then spake forth Joshua in a loud voice, saying, "Stand ye fast, whilst I seek a seance," and they stood fast. And it came to pass as he spake these things that a message from the great "virgin despoiler" was delivered in his ears, saying, "Send ye forth two spies out of Shittim that they may go forth and view the land even Jericho, that they may enter into the city and see who playeth in their back-yards." Then goeth he and taketh two spies out of Shittim and saith "Go forth and enter ye into the city of Jericho west of Jordan, and be ye careful to find out how the land lieth, so ye can straightway return and tell us." Now it came to pass after he had said these things, that they went forth and entered into the city, and they said one to another, "He that hath eyes to see, let him see," and it was so. Now when they had multitudinally seen they said, "Go to. Let us have some fun." And it came to pass as they spake these things a certain woman, whose name was Rahab, a keeper of a dive, lifted up her voice and said, "Look ye no farther, I have the best dive, and the best selection that dwell in the city. Ye are welcome. The last shall be first. What say ye?" And they walked in. Now straightway it was told the king of Jericho, saying, "Behold there came two men in hither to search the city, and are even now at this time carousing at Rahab's dive." Then spake the king to his people saying, "We cannot suffer Israelites to enjoy our chief place of amusement." And they arose with one accord and covered the distance. But Rahab seeing them afar off, saith to the spies, "Get thee to the house-top, that I may cover thee with flax, lest they make thee prisoners and stone thee to death, for behold the king seeketh thee even now." And they did according as Rahab ordered them. "Howbeit," saith Rahab, "this event shall be a by-word even to the end of time." And it was so, even to this day. The king marvelled greatly, and saith to the soldiers, "These men have absconded I believe for a surety. Rahab is the cutest woman in the city. She hath the greatest dive on earth in which to hide." And they with one accord vacated. Then went forth Rahab and saith to the spies, "I know of a truth that ye are 'tooters,' and that the king is fooled for once. They have departed. Now, therefore, thou hast had thy fun to thy heart's content; get thee up that I may let thee down the outer wall that thou mayest go home to Joshua, the son of Nun, and report thy findings. Thou wilt surely tell him how well we did receive and entertain thee, and that we will still be doing business at the old stand when he cometh to take the city."

Now therefore know ye not that as soon as the spies returned Joshua, the son of Nun, was made glad even to rending his clothing in pieces, and straightway he cried out with a loud voice, saying to the centurions and soldiers, "Get thee in readiness for the onslaught and especially, O Gideon, get thy ram's horns in tune, for much dependeth on the band-master."

Then cried out Joshua again, saying, "Go to. I have had a message from the greatest of all 'virgin despoilers,' saying 'Go thou and march thee around the high walls of the city once each day for six and the seventh day seven times shalt thou march around it, and the last round shalt be called the home-stretch, and thou shalt withal have Gideon the band-master and his band to continuously play whilst thou marchest and the last and home-stretch-round thou shalt have them blow one long, loud, and continuous blast even to the extent that no other horn would tolerate, and thou shalt see the strength and power and wisdom of thy God. Thou shalt see that he is indeed a virgin destroyer as well as a despoiler. Thou shalt see the walls fall flat, and thou shalt see both old and young and little babes destroyed off the face of the earth forever." And it was so. Selah! In a horn.

MORAL.

Any man who says that he implicitly believes the narration that has here been considered (Joshua i, 11, etc.), and that the deeds there narrated were righteous and that justice was perfectly done to all parties concerned, is either crazy, a hypocrite, or a natural fool. Z. C. DENNEY.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

A Sermon in Rhyme.

If you have a friend worth loving,
Love him. Yes, and let him know
That you love him, ere life's evening
Tinge his brow with sunset glow,
Why should good words ne'er be said
Of a friend—till he is dead?

If you hear a song that thrills you,
Sung by any child of song,
Praise it. Do not let the singer
Wait deserved praises long.
Why should one who thrills your heart
Lack the joy you may impart?

If you see the hot tears falling
From a brother's weeping eyes,
Share them. And by kindly sharing
Own your kinship with the skies.
Why should anyone be glad
When a brother's heart is sad?

If a silvery laugh goes rippling
Through the sunshine on his face,
Share it. 'Tis the wise man's saying—
For both joy and grief a place.
There's health and goodness in the mirth
In which an honest laugh has birth.

If your work is made more easy
By a friendly, helping hand,
Say so. Speak out brave and truly,
Ere the darkness veil the land.
Should a brother workman dear
Falter for a word of cheer?

Scatter thus your seeds of kindness,
All enriching as you go—
Leave them. Trust the Harvest Giver,
Nature makes good seed to grow,
So, until its happy end,
Your life shall never lack a friend.

A Letter and Its Answer.

"ALL FOR JESUS."

WARRENVILLE, CONN., June 27, 1895.
MISS S. H. WIXON—My Friend: Some time since I received a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and my heart was made to sorrow to see such a paper. I did not know there could be such a bad paper, though, years ago, a young gentleman friend said to me, "There is something in a paper uncle takes which I wish you would see." I said, "Well, bring it over." He said, "No, it is THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I would not insult you by bringing such a paper into your house." Now that I have seen one (the first one, and, I trust, the last), I don't wonder he would not insult me by bringing it here. If any one who is acquainted with me should send me such a paper, I should consider it an insult. I looked in the children's department, and there saw your name. As I saw it, it came to me to write to you, as I often do to strangers, and beg of you to seek truth where alone it can be found, viz., in the Bible, the word of God. I beg of you to "Look to Jesus and be saved," etc. . . . I beg you to stop and think what you are doing. Think of the time when you shall stand before God to give an account of your doings, etc. . . . If you will think of these things, I am sure you will feel you need the pardon Christ alone can give, etc. . . . In the paper sent me I saw, too, a letter from a boy of fourteen—Charles C. Carlton—who said, "Christians didn't bother them any more, as they found they couldn't convert them." Poor boy, I am so sorry for him, etc. . . . A few days ago I met a stranger, who, on reading the heading of a tract I had given him, which read, "Stop, poor sinner, Jesus loves you," said to me: "All very good if one can believe it, but I can't; I'm an infidel. I was brought up to love God and honor him, but twelve years ago I ran away from home, and have drifted away from all good," etc. . . . Is it so with you, my sister? Did your dear mother teach you to kneel by her side and offer your evening prayer? etc. . . . It will be a terrible thing to die and not be a Christian; terrible, indeed, to die a Christless death, to be laid in a Christless grave. Turn to him, etc.

DELIA A. GIFFORD.

The editor of the Children's Corner is frequently in receipt of letters of similar import to the one published above. She usually drops them into the waste-basket without comment, having little time at her disposal to bestow upon such missives. The evident sincerity of the writer of the above letter leads her to reply through the channel of this department.

*Mrs. Gifford's letter covers six closely-written pages, and to print it all would be a total waste of space. Where "etc. . . ." occurs, the reader will know that something has been omitted, and if he has ever heard the come-to-Jesus exhortation of an excited female, he can imagine what that something is.—ED. T. S.

Mrs. Gifford appears to be in earnest, just as anyone believing the diabolical doctrines she professes, ought to be. The wonder is that all professing belief in eternal punishment are not as sincere in endeavors to save from "the wrath to come." How anyone believing such horrible and barbarous teachings can ever smile or be happy is beyond comprehension. It was hardly courteous to reflect upon so able a paper as THE TRUTH SEEKER in the way that Mrs. Gifford has done. If it is an insult to receive papers whose doctrines we do not accept, then the editor of the Corner is frequently insulted by having forced upon her attention such papers as King's Messenger, and other religious sheets, to say nothing of religious tracts. Mrs. Gifford declares truth can be found nowhere but in the Bible. She surely cannot mean this, for truth is everywhere, and the Bible contains many proven false statements.

Does our friend believe the earth was made and completed in six days? Scholars will tell her it has been millions of years in process of formation, and is not finished yet. Does she believe the earth is flat? That is the teaching of the Bible, but we know it is a globe, round and not flat. Does she believe the sun stood still at command of Joshua that he might have more daylight to slay his enemies? In respect to the earth, any schoolboy will tell us that the sun always stands still, and it is the earth that revolves around the sun. Does she take all the silly, improbable, ignorant falsehoods that are found scattered along the pages of "Holy Writ," from Genesis to Revelation, as absolute truth? Mrs. Gifford begs me to "look to Jesus," and get saved. Saved from what? If she will look into our prisons she will find them filled, not by Liberals and Infidels, but by professed followers of Jesus, and people are obliged to keep constant watch and ward against Christian thieves, swindlers, adulterers, and murderers, who do not hesitate to do their dreadful work anywhere, and everywhere, even in the very church edifice itself, as in the case of the young women murdered, not long since, in a church in California. One would think there is work enough to do in saving these miserable sinners, before laying siege to those whose daily lives are steadfast, moral, and upright.

Rejecting Christ! There are grave doubts in the minds of many Biblical students whether such a being ever existed, his prototype being found in more ancient religions. Nothing was written concerning him till after he had been dead a half century or so, and no history of his time alludes to him, except Josephus in one slight passage which is believed to be an interpolation.

He himself, according to scripture, wrote nothing, except on one occasion, when he wrote upon the sand, and he never went to church but once, and then he went with a horsewhip. It is not for me to say that he would not take the same implement of punishment along were he to go to church to-day. The editor of the Corner does nothing knowingly for which she should ask pardon. Her doings are open and above-board. She is conscientiously doing as nearly right as she knows, and cannot tell what in her conduct requires forgiveness.

That which Charley Carlton wrote is obviously true, and it is therefore in evidence that professing people do not believe the cruel dogmas they teach.

In regard to "drifting from all good," it matters little what people think, so long as men and women do not so drift. It is the conduct by which we judge

Our acts our angels are, if good; if ill,
The fatal shadows that walk by us still.

Perhaps Mrs. Gifford will give the name and address of the young man who "drifted," and inquiry will be made into the case. It is not common to find prodigal sons among true Liberals—they are generally on the other side.

One word in regard to the mother of the editor of this Corner. She was a noble woman. She taught her children to live true, honorable, and cleanly lives; to be honest and truthful; to avoid evil and wrong-doing; to be good, pure, and true in every sense of these sweet words. She did not warp their minds by false teachings, nor did she bias them in any direction save that of goodness. She contrasted the false and true, and let their judgment decide which was the better. She taught them without prejudice, and with a leaning only toward the right. She taught them to fearlessly follow truth where'er it leads the way, to be kind, gentle, tolerant, and to owe no one anything but love and good-will. Did Mrs. Gifford's mother do better than that?

Mrs. Gifford thinks it a terrible thing to die and not be a Christian. It is not so, my friend. You are mistaken. Sensible people are never afraid to die. It is as natural to die as to be born. It is in the wise ordering of nature, and, as others died to make room for us, so we shall die to make a place for those who are to come. It has been the privilege of the editor of this Corner to stand by the bedside of dying persons who had not a belief such as Mrs. Gifford indicates as hers, and they passed away as calmly and sweetly as a babe at rest upon its mother's bosom, without a particle of fear or trouble as to the future. It has been her privilege, also, to conduct the funeral exercises of such by their particular request, they making all arrangements for their departure as calmly as though preparing for a pleasant visit to relatives and friends.

The fear, my friend, is with those who believe the monstrous and inhuman doctrine of a "loving heavenly father" capable of punishing his children forever and holding them in a lake of fire and brimstone, solely because they could not honestly say "I believe that Jesus died for me," and they would not be hypocrites.

In conclusion, we thank the unknown, but well-meaning lady for her interest in our welfare. We would assure her that our soul is in good condition. It is all right, but we take her words in the spirit they are given, and shall cherish no enmity against her. Religion is a matter of education, training, and geography. In India our friend would have believed in the religion of the Brahmins. In China she would have been a follower of Confucius. In Persia she would reverence the teachings of Zoroaster. In Arabia she would have worshiped at the feet of Mohammed. Brought up and educated in a Catholic country, she would have been a devout Roman Catholic. Having been taught by Protestant Christians, naturally she has imbibed their teachings. Christianity is a small part of the entire religious population of the globe, and if only Christians can be "saved," to use the popular vernacular, what an immense number of the world's population will be "lost!"

Now, this sister, who exhibits such kindly feeling, is, in our opinion, very much in the dark. We would like to see her converted to truth, and therefore take the same liberty with her as she has taken with us. She has much to learn, and should have read, not simply one side of a question, but both sides, before deciding. She should read, not with the eye of faith and prejudice, but with the clear, open, honest vision of candor, reason, and common sense. Read Volney's "Ruins," D'Holbach's "System of Nature," the "Letters to Eugenia," Paine's "Age of Reason," Graves's "Sixteen Crucified Saviors," and, for diversion, perhaps, the "Crimes of Preachers." It would be well to diversify her reading with some modern geological works, showing how the world was made, Proctor's Astronomical series, etc. It is not her fault maybe, but anyone can see that Mrs. Gifford is behind in her reading, and has not been in the habit of reasoning about the topics upon which she dilates. A little more study, a little more reason and exercise of judgment, and Mrs. Gifford will come out of the dark into the light of truth and understanding. With best wishes for a speedy conversion to truth as it is in reality, we remain, the friend of humanity,

THE BRAIN AND BIBLE;
OR
THE CONFLICT BETWEEN MENTAL SCIENCE AND THEOLOGY.
By EDGAR C. BEALL, M.D.,
with a preface by
R. G. INGERSOLL.
This is the only work of its kind in the literature of Freethought. Its arguments are based upon scientific phrenology, and appeal directly to the reader's sense of logic and love of justice. It is eloquent as well as convincing.
Price, cloth, $1. Address THE TRUTH SEEKER.

By the census of 1890, the above is the value of

Church Property

in the United States.

Should It Be Exempt from Taxation?

REASONS WHY IT SHOULD NOT.

Our pamphlet with this title contains an Argument for Equality of Taxation, and a Statement of Facts, giving, from the Census of 1890, the value, by Denominations, of Church Property in the United States and in the several States and Territories and in all Cities having 25,000 or more inhabitants; so arranged as to show at a glance the relative standing as to Wealth of the Leading Denominations and Denominational Groups. Also, much other matter of especial interest to certain Cities, States, and Sections, all comparisons being based upon official figures.

This pamphlet is the only one of the kind published. In no other work are the facts, figures, and arguments to be found. The figures, being derived from the Government Census of 1890, will not be superseded until the census of 1900 shall have been completed—probably about eight years hence. The arguments are unanswerable and will have the dew of morning on them so long as the injustice of church exemption is suffered to exist.

By single copies the price is 15 cents, but as the work is published specially for distribution by those who favor justice in taxation the following reductions are made:

Ten copies.....	$1.00
Fifty copies.....	4.50
One hundred copies.....	8.00

400 Years OF Freethought

By Samuel Porter Putnam

Large Octavo, 1165 pp., Gilt Sides and Back, Marbled Edges. $5.

With The Truth Seeker for One Year, $6.50.

141 FULL-PAGE PORTRAITS!

Of the Most Eminent Freethinkers, of the Past Four Hundred Years.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY announced in October that this superb work was at last ready for delivery. It had been in preparation for so long that some of the subscribers were getting a little impatient and wondering when they would have the opportunity to see for themselves whether it possessed all the merits claimed for it by the publishers. They did not realize the magnitude of the work, and that the six months' delay in getting it out was due to the fact that they were to have fifty per cent more reading than they had been promised and nearly three times as many portraits. Such was the case, however. Instead of six hundred pages of letter-press there are nearly nine hundred, and the fifty portraits promised in the prospectus have multiplied to one hundred and forty-one! Considering the fact that the illustrations are the most costly part of the book—as undoubtedly to many they will also be the most attractive—and properly estimating the expense of the extra three hundred pages of text, it is evident that the subscriber received about one hundred per cent more for his $5 than was guaranteed to him. Well, the nearly eleven hundred copies of the volume subscribed for were sent out, and now we know what the recipients think of their investment. Judging by the letters that reach this office, they are not only satisfied—more than satisfied—but surprised and delighted that they got such a bargain.

As for the subject matter of FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT, it covers nearly every phase of progress and development and presents them in such orderly sequence as to give the best possible picture of human evolution. In Part First we have Freethought as a manifestation and influence; in Part Second, as an organized force. With this history are given sketches of the lives of the men and women who have taken part in the movement. It unites the past and the present. It is a world book and a home book. It fulfils the promise of its inception, and is the most magnificent work ever issued by the Freethought Press.

WITH DAUGHTER'S BABE UPON HIS KNEES.

A new edition of that splendid prose poem "Life," by "the prince of orators," Col. R. G. Ingersoll. It is larger and better than the old edition, and can be framed or placed upon the table as an ornament. In the center of the card appear the portraits of the Colonel and the baby, surrounded by the prose poem, which has been truthfully described as, "one of the masterpieces of the orator and poet, who now, as far as we know, stands alone in the living world." It will make a delightful present, and will be a souvenir not only of intellectual greatness, but of artistic workmanship. It is printed on heavy board, gilt boveled edge. The size is 12x16 inches, and the price only 75 cents, post-paid.

Gems of Thought.

EVERY right action and true thought sets the seal of its beauty on person and face.—Ruskin.

If grand celebrations like those at Kiel had to be paid for by the great men who enjoy the fun and the champagne there would be fewer royal flutters of that kind.—Galveston News.

It must be remembered that a man may apparently have all society against him and yet be engaged in a work which will certainly and thoroughly revolutionize its opinions and its habits.—Dr. J. G. Holland.

THE most cultivated minds are usually the most patient, most clear, most rationally progressive, most studios of accuracy in details, because not impatiently shut up within them, as absolutely limiting the view, but quietly contemplating them from without in their relation to the whole. . . . This adaptation to the humblest wants is the peculiar triumph of the highest spirit of knowledge.—James Martineau.

VOLTAIRE was annoyed by the meaner and baser spirits of his time, by the oringers and crawlers, by the fawners and pretenders, by those who wished to gain the favor of priests, the patronage of nobles. Sometimes he allowed himself to be annoyed by these wretches; sometimes he attacked them. And, but for those attacks, long ago they would have been forgotten. In the amber of his genius Voltaire preserved these insects, these tarantulas, these scorpions.—Ingersoll.

RECOGNIZE the fact that incorporated masses of men grow, and acquire their structural characters through modification upon modification, and there are excluded those antithetical errors that humanity remains the same, and that humanity is readily alterable; and along with exclusion of these errors comes admission of the truth, that causes like those which have brought social arrangements to a form so different from past forms, will in future carry them on to forms as different from those now existing.—Herbert Spencer.

STRANGER, if thou hast learned a truth which needs
No school of long experience, that the world
Is full of guilt and misery, and hast seen Enough of all its sorrows, crimes, and cares
To tire thee of it, enter this wild wood
And view the haunts of nature. The calm shade
Shall bring a kindred calm, and the sweet breeze
That makes the green dance, shall waft a balm
To thy sick heart. —Bryant.

It is over and over again in history the most clearly taught of all lessons that no quarrels are so bitter as antagonisms growing out of religious prejudices and race hatreds. It was for this reason, among other excellent political ones, that the framers of the American organic law pronounced against any combination of church and state, and declared for absolute religious freedom and equality in this country. Men or communities, on either side, who are agitating such issues and dragging them into politics are utterly un-American in spirit. A constitution would be but waste paper to them had they the power to dispose of it.—Houston (Texas) Post.

THE smoke from the burning censurs of stupid adoration in the Sistine chapel has well nigh obliterated the great outlines of Angelo's figures in the ceiling. So much of the unreasoning and uncritical adoration of George Washington in the years past has smirched and bedimmed his manly outlines. "Can't you take Washington down a little? You have set him too high," said Carlyle to an American. Nothing has done so much to set Washington down lower than where he belongs as the foolish attempt to set him higher than where he belongs. With him, as with the other great children of men, let us say, "Away with myth and fable; truth and reality are more wonderful and more beautiful.—Unity.

THE "people" who exercise the power are not always the same people with those over whom it is exercised, and the "self-government" spoken of is not the government of each by himself, but of each by all the rest. The will of the people, moreover, practically means the will of the most numerous or the most active part of the people—the majority, or those who succeed in making themselves accepted as the majority. The people consequently may desire to oppress a part of their number, and precautions are as much needed against this as against any other abuse of power. The limitation, therefore, of the power of government over individuals loses none of its importance when the holders of power are regularly accountable to the community—that is, to the strongest party therein.—John Stuart Mill.

AN ANTIDOTE ANALYZED. Reply to a Christian who had attacked Freethinkers, and Exposing the Inconsistency of Christians generally. H. C. Luse.

BIBLE TEMPERANCE. Showing that Liquor Drinking is Commended, Defended, and Enjoined by the Bible. Edwin C. Walker. CHRISTIANITY A REWARD FOR CRIME Authenticated by the Bible. O. B. Whitford, M.D.

DID MAN FALL? Is the Garden of Eden a Fact? Israel W. Groh.

EPIDEMIC DELUSIONS. A Lecture by Frederic R. Marvin, M.D. Giving reasonable reasons for Religions and other Delusions.

FALSE CLAIMS OF THE CHURCH. John M. Remsburg's most noted work, and one of the most effective ever written by any Freethinker.

FIRST EPISTLE OF BENNETT THE APOSTLE TO THE TRUTH SEEKERS. Written while journeying in and near the land of Yahweh. Containing the best moral instructions of the world from the great teachers of the former ages. D. M. Bennett.

THE GIANT DELUSION. A paper read before the Freethought International Congress at Chicago. One of Otto Wettstein's fraternal attacks on Spiritualism.

THE GLORY OF INFIDELITY. To which is added a poem on Thomas Paine. One of Samuel P. Putnam's most brilliant lectures. Every Christian who asks the idiotic question, "What Has Infidelity Done?" should be induced to read this book, if he has to be paid to do it.

HOW CAN WE BE SAVED? Was Jesus Supernaturally Conceived, and did he Rise from the Dead? Israel W. Groh.

INGERSOLL AND JESUS. Showing how the two agree. A poem by Samuel P. Putnam.

THE LIMITATIONS OF TOLERANCE. A discussion between Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, Hon. Frederic R. Condit, Ex-Gov. Stewart L. Woodford, before the Nineteenth Century Club of New York. "Each man has the same right to express to the whole world his ideas that the rest of the world have to express their thoughts to him." Colonel Ingersoll maintains this, the others deny it. Mr. Condit is a Roman Catholic, Mr. Woodford a Protestant.

MATERIALISM: Its History, and Its Influence Upon Society. Dr. Louis Buchner.

MIRACLES AND MIRACLE WORKERS. A Consideration of the Marvels and Miracles of the New Testament. One of John Peck's best books.

MOSES BEFORE THE COURT, or The Forgery of the Old Testament. Dedicated to the Clergy. H. J. Seignuret, M.D.

THE NEW GOD. "It is an open secret that man has always made his Gods. They exist in and through him, as the image exists in and through the mirror. Take away man and you take away God—the image vanishes." This pamphlet, therefore, is a consideration of what kind of a God man should make. Samuel P. Putnam.

ORTHODOXY. A lecture by Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll, and one of that great man's best. The subjects considered are: Orthodox Religion Dying Out, Religious Deaths and Births, The Religion of Reciprocity, Mohammed, The Destruction of Art, The Discovery of America, Copernicus and Kepler, Charles Darwin, Special Providence, The Latest Creed, God as a Governor, The Love of God, The Fall of Man, The Atonement, The Second Birth, Inspiration, The Reign of Truth and Love, The Wars It Brought, The Resurrection, The Judgment Day, Pious Evasions, "No Bible, No Civilization," Miracles of the New Testament, The Ascension, Casting out Devils, Necessity of Belief, Eternal Punishment, Some Who Are Damned, What I Believe, Immortality. This lecture is on the famous text, "The Clergy know that I know that they do not know." PERSONAL EXISTENCE AFTER DEATH IMPROBABLE. L. R. Smith. PROCEEDING OF THE CIVIL RIGHTS MASS MEETING AT LINCOLN HALL, WASHINGTON. Being the Speeches of Hon. FREDERICK DOUGLASS and Col. ROBERT G. INGERSOLL on the Decision of the United States Court that the Civil Rights Act is Unconstitutional. Fifty-three large octavo pages, of which Colonel Ingersoll's speech occupies 38 pages.

PULPIT, PEW, AND CRADLE. So long as the Pulpit speaks to believing Pews composed chiefly of mothers, the cradle will be rocked by ghosts and the race will remain on its knees to a devil of its own creation and to a God who is powerless against him. One of Hel'n Gardener's brightest efforts.

THE RELIGION OF HUMANITY BETTER THAN ETERNAL PUNISHMENT. M. Babcock.

RELIGIOUS PROBLEMS. One of L. K. Washburn's best lectures, and it is, like all of his, very good.

THE ROARING LION ON THE TRACK. One of M. Babcock's comical sermons.

SCIENCE vs. RELIGION, or The Conflict Between Reason and Superstition. T. C. Widdcombe.

ST. MATTHEW BEFORE THE COURT. Presenting the evidence of the forgery of his alleged gospel. H. J. Seignuret.

SISTER LUCY AND HER AWFUL DISCLOSURES REGARDING NEW HALL CONVENT. Showing that Convents are inimical to chastity, virtue, and freedom.

SPIRITUALISM FROM A MATERIALISTIC STANDPOINT. B. F. Underwood. Written before Mr. Underwood joined the Psychic Researchers.

THUMBSCREW AND RACK. Torture Implements Employed in the 15th and 16th centuries for the promulgation of Christianity. Being the Nuremberg Collection, with specimens from the Holy Inquisition. 28 pictures. The descriptions and reflections by George E. Macdonald.

VICTOR HUGO'S ORATION ON VOLTAIRE, delivered on the one hundredth anniversary of Voltaire's death. Translated by James Parton, author of the Life of Voltaire. To which are added the three great poems of Goethe, George Eliot and Longfellow.

WAS CHRIST CRUCIFIED? Austin Bierbower. A lawyer's consideration of the evidence of that alleged event.

WAS JESUS INSANE? A consideration of Christ's alleged acts which would lead one to that conclusion. L. K. Washburn.

WHY DON'T HE LEND A HAND? And other Agnostic Poems. Samuel P. Putnam. The title poem is perhaps the most popular of Mr. Putnam's many poems, and a great many editions of it have been called for. The other poems are: The Golden Age, The Ideal and the Real, Not Dead, but Living, Fruition, Hope, Thomas Paine, Nature's Gospel, Address to Deity, and the short poem so often recited with great effect by Charles Watts, Give Us Light.

WILL THE COMING MAN WORSHIP GOD? B. F. Underwood; written before Mr. Underwood joined the Psychic Researchers.

WOMAN: FOUR CENTURIES OF PROGRESS. A lecture delivered at the Freethinkers' International Congress at Chicago. Considering: The Cause of Woman's Subjugation, The Canon Law and Its Effects Upon Her, Theology Never Helpful to Woman, Invention Woman's Friend, Freethought the Benefactor of Woman. Susan H. Wixon.

WOMAN: HER PAST AND PRESENT, HER RIGHTS AND WRONGS. A lecture delivered before the Woman Suffrage Association of Denver, Col., by B. F. Underwood.

Liberty for Man,

Woman, and Child

"Reading this lecture," remarked a friend the other day, "will make men better; for if a man reads it one night on his way home, the next night he will take along some oranges or something to his family." This lecture is gotten up in the handsome style of "Voltaire" and "Lincoln," and has as a frontispiece a fine photo-engraving of the Colonel and both his grandchildren, Eva and Robert, the little fellow upon his knee, and Eva in her high chair. It is a pretty picture, and the Colonel's millions of friends will take pleasure in it. In this pamphlet is also the Colonel's Tribute to His Brother, which so many have desired to have in convenient form. Price, 25 cents.

VOLTAIRE

"Voltaire was the greatest man of his century, and did more to free the human race than any other of the sons of men." A lecture by INGERSOLL, with portrait of Voltaire. A handsome pamphlet. Every Freethinker will surely want it. Price, 25 cents.

MINISTER (in his sermon): "The Lord reigns." Deacon (waking up): "And my thunderin' old umberill is at home!"

NEW MINISTER: "I saw you going into a saloon yesterday, Mr. DeGood." Mr. DeGood: "Yes; my wife was off to a church society meeting, and I dropped in there for something to eat."—New York Weekly.

LITTLE BILLY had been trained to wait until served, and not to ask for his dinner. The other day, visitors being present, Billy was overlooked. Presently he asked, "Mamma, when little boys starve to death, do they go to heaven?"

If that New Jersey lightning had played its pranks with a theater or a concert-hall, instead of a church, how many morals would have been drawn from it for the benefit of those who frequent "worldly amusements"!—New York Tribune.

"AND NOW," shouted the exhorter, "what is to be done when a man is rushing headlong, with lightning speed, along the road to destruction?" Deacon Jones (between snores): "Reduce—size o' yer sprocket! She's too high gear!"—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

A CLERGYMAN of the Baptist persuasion, holding forth in a Texas town, recently commenced his discourse thusly: "My dear friends: I want to talk to you about the infinit power of the almighty. He created a mighty ocean—and he created a pebble. He created the solar system—and he created the world—and he created a grain of sand. My friends, he created me! and he created—a daisy."

THE barber shops are closed in Brooklyn to-day, and the soda fountains are forbid den to play in New York. Now, if we can hav the street cars stopped, the "L" trains suspended, and the holes in the slot machines stuffed up, we may get back to somewhere near the standard of the good old New England days, when the Yankee farmer used to throw his cider barrel out of the cellar if he caught it working on Sunday.—The New York Recorder, Sunday, July 14, 1895.

"I WOULDN'T be such a heathen as you are, John," said his wife as she stood in the doorway dressed for church. "You could go with me very well if you wanted to." "How can I?" he half sobbed. "There's the wood to be split, and the coal to be shoveled over to the other side of the cellar, and no dishes washed for dinner yet." "Ah, I didn't think of that," she murmured, thoughtfully, and giving her new cloak a fresh hitch aft, sailed out alone.

PAT was on his way to church, and on the road met the priest. "Good morning, Pat." "Good morning, yer reverence." "Where are you going?" "To mass, sor." "Well, Pat, what is the meaning of mass?" Now Pat did not know, but he was bound not to let the priest find it out. "The loikes of you asking the loikes of me the maning of mass!" "Now, Pat, tell me, anyway." "I don't like to tell you." "But suppose a Protestant should ask you?" "Oh, I could easily tell him." "Well, I will be a Protestant and meet you at the next corner." So the priest walked away and met Pat at the next corner. "Good morning, Pat." "Good morning, yer honor." "Where are you going?" "To mass, sor." "What does mass mean?" "Well, if you're a Protestant, it's none of your business."—New York Advertiser.

By a telegram from Macon, Ga., lovers of "civil and religious liberty" may learn that forty citizens of that place have been arrested for the crime of selling dry goods, groceries, meat, and bread on the day of the week that some of their fellow men have corrected God by declaring "holy." In Tennessee a little while ago a considerable number of persons guilty of the same offense were working in the public street each with a ball-and-chain attached to his mortal part. For anything that I know to the contrary they are still so working. Wherefore, my brethren in the faith, let us inflate our American lungs with holy atmosphere from some contiguous church and thank God right stentoriously that in this favored land religious persecution is unknown—though the wicked must, of course, obey the laws. Is it not so, Parson Whackbible? Is that not about the truth of the matter, Father Bellyworship? And you, Sister Primpety, your soul in our papers against the Second Coming, hav I not rightly outlined the situation? O brute bigots, hearted tigerly all and minded madwise, if you but had the power that you forego for the happiness of hating one another worse than you hate us, how you would make us all smoke!—Ambrose Bierce, in San Francisco Examiner.

The Glory of Infidelity

WITH A POEM ON Thomas Paine

By SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

This is one of the best of Mr. Putnam's works, and no Freethinker or Infidel should be without it, to meet the claims of Christians that Infidelity is an inglorious philosophy.

THE ELIXIR OF LIFE

is not in magic potions, "specifics" or electric clays, but only in WISDOM—THE SCIENCE OF HEALTH. Wise men study nature, shun disease learn to maintain vigor and regain it by reading the most complete book of Medical, Social, Sexual Science, by an eminent physician of 35 years experience. The "old, original, standard" work, endorsed by all, imitated by many, equalled by none. Inspired by wish to aid humanity, it has providentially saved thousands. Its essays on marriage, parentage, adaptation, marital duties, etc., are of inestimable value to all now married or who ever expect to be. The last edition has 1,000 pages, 3 colored charts of vital organs, 200 wood cuts, 21 chromos showing origin of life—development of man. APPENDIX has over 200 Recipes. Only $1.50 by Mail; Circulars Free. Address THE TRUTH SEEKER CO., 28 Lafayette Place New York.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—[Freethinkers' Magazine.]

A small farm of 10 acres 86 perches, located within one and a half miles of Media county seat and within four miles of Chester, Pa., on the Delaware river. Several springs of soft water, good timber growing on the place, some choice apple and pear trees in fruiting condition. House and barn on the place, but are old buildings. Within five minutes walk of the railroad station, 9 miles from Philadelphia. Trolley line between Media and Chester, with less than five minutes walk.

The place is specially well located for a florist, and it would be a fine summer residence for one who would put a modern house on it. Eight years ago the land adjoining sold for $618 per acre, and no land near it has sold as low as that since. Several smaller places have sold at $1,000 per acre. The land slopes toward the southwest, overlooking beautiful woodland scenery.

THE PLACE CAN BE BOUGHT FOR $3,500.

News of the Week.

A SHARP earthquake was felt in Peru on August 20th.

It is stated that the United States will be asked to arbitrate the difficulties between Peru and Bolivia.

On August 22d railroad property and warehouses in Milwaukee were burned, entailing a loss of $400,000.

BRITISH troops are engaged in an expedition against the "revolting" tribes around Mombassa, East Africa.

THE striking vestmakers, cloakmakers, and upholsterers in New York have received the increased wages demanded.

FRANCE is sacrificing thousands of her soldiers in the attempt to appropriate Madagascar. They are dying like sheep from disease.

THE Maryland Populists nominated Henry T. Andrew for governor, indorsed the Omaha platform, and declared against the coinage of silver at 16 to 1.

KEIR HARDIE, the English Socialist leader, and lately member of Parliament, but defeated for reelection, is now in the United States on a lecturing tour.

A TWO-DAYS battle is reported at Mata, Cuba, where the insurgents landed an expedition almost under the guns of a Spanish warship. Result not known here.

WHEN we get God into the Constitution shall we issue postage stamps in honor of the saints? Portugal has just issued one in honor of Saint Anthony of Padua.

IN the Ohio Democratic convention Senator Brice was in control and the Chicago platform was reaffirmed. Ex-Governor James E. Campbell was nominated for governor.

A FURNACE in the Carnegie Mills at Pittsburgh became clogged with gas and an explosion followed, killing eight workmen and injuring three others. This was on August 20th.

LI HUNG CHANG's troops mutinied because they had not been paid. Afterward they attacked shops in Tientsin and killed over a hundred persons. So a London dispatch says.

THE collapse of the Gumry Hotel in Denver, caused by the explosion of the elevator boiler, resulted in more than twenty deaths, including that of Gen. Charles Adams.

It is now claimed that Captain Samuel Morey invented a steamboat which, in 1793, made a trial trip on the Connecticut river, fourteen years before Fulton made his experiment on the Hudson.

At Sofia, Bulgaria, the editor of the Svoboda has been imprisoned for three years for publishing an article declaring that Prince Ferdinand was morally responsible for the murder of Stambuloff.

It is reported that six of the Chinese who were concerned in the recent massacre of the missionaries have been convicted of murder, and that new arrests are being made daily. Four of the murderers have been executed.

JOSEPH LAYDEN, of Malden, Kanawha county, W. Va., is seventy-four years of age. His wife is fifty-five. On Monday Mrs. Layden gave birth to a male child. The newcomer is the twenty-eighth child born to Mr. and Mrs. Layden.

IN Kentucky, General Hardin, Democratic candidate for governor, refuses either to harmonize his utterances on silver with the state platform or to retire from the ticket. Colonel Bradley, the republican nominee, is greatly encouraged by this.

AN infernal machine was sent to the house of the Rothschilds in Paris on August 24th. It was opened by the confidential clerk of Baron Alphonse de Rothschild. It exploded, tearing out the right eye and amputating several fingers of the clerk.

THE new Home Secretary of England has promised to investigate the case of Mrs. Florence Maybrick, sentenced to life imprisonment some years ago for the alleged murder of her husband, a crime of which many people have never believed her guilty.

THE veteran Freethinker, John Chappellsmith, who lived for many years in Indiana, died on March 5, 1895, at Sheffield, England, of which country he was a native. The news has been long in reaching this side. Mr. Chappellsmith was very old.

THE Liquor Dealers' Association of New York, to which belong about five-eighths of the retail dealers in this city, has concluded to make no further fight against the enforcement of the Sunday excise law, but to labor for the enactment of a more liberal statute.

At Chicago on the night of August 21st the roof of the Coliseum, in process of construction, fell in with a tremendous crash, ruining the whole structure and entailing a loss of hundreds of thousands of dollars. The accident caused no deaths, as one shift of 300 men had just gone off and the next had not come on.

IN Mexico they are taking to punishing duelists. Colonel Romero, who killed Verastegui, has been sentenced to three years and four months in prison, to pay a fine of $1,800, or serve three months more in prison, and to pay to Verastegui's widow and children $4,500 per year for eighteen years. Also the dead man's funeral expenses.

"ONE kind of law" was in force in this state last Sunday as follows: New York city, beer gardens shut tight, barber-shops wide open (until 1 P.M.); Brooklyn, beer gardens open, barber-shops shut tight; Saratoga and Niagara Falls, both wide open; Poughkeepsie and Binghamton, both shut tight; Albany, Troy, Buffalo, Kingston, Rochester, Utica, Auburn, and Cohoes, side doors of saloons open, barbers shut tight; Syracuse, saloons open after 1 P.M., barbers shut tight.

ON the editorial page of the New York World of August 26th three wide columns are devoted to an elucidation of the principle of justice—"What liberty and law require of the individual and should secure to him"—consisting of editorial and excerpts from the writings of Lalor, Judge Story, Blackstone, Kant, Willard, Herbert Spencer, B. A. Hinsdale, and H. D. Lloyd.

LAST Sunday in this city the fashionable clubs were wide open, and the hotels and leading cafés were selling all kinds of drinks, while the saloons in the tenement districts were tightly closed and a man was held for trial for selling five cents' worth of ice to a girl from a tenement house, another for selling three cents' worth of writing paper to a policeman, and still another for showing a policeman, at the latter's earnest solicitation, a pair of rubber shoes.

SOME GOOD THINGS THAT BONAPARTE DID.

Special NEW SUBSCRIBER Offer.

We wish, for two good and valid reasons, to greatly extend the circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER. First, we want its influence for good and its efforts for greater liberty of thought to be more widely distributed, and consequently more effective. Second, we want more subscribers to help pay its expenses and enable us to do more work. And we wish to emphasize both of these reasons. Our present subscribers can do a great deal for us if they will, and to get them to aid us we are willing to reward them; we therefore make this SPECIAL NEW SUBSCRIBER OFFER:

To any subscriber now on our list who will get a new name for the list for one year, sending us three dollars for the same, we will send free a copy of the FREETHINKER'S PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK, in board covers (price TWO DOLLARS).

And to anyone whose name is not now on our list we make this offer: Send us three dollars for the paper one year, and we will send you free the PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK.

The pictures in the FREETHINKER'S PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK were made and the text written to show the absurdity and untruthfulness of the Church's claim to being a divine and infallible institution, and to reveal the abuses of a union of church and state. It has 185 Full-page Illustrations, with copious citations of Facts, History, Statistics, and Opinions of Scholars to maintain the argument of the Artist. The Designs are by WATSON HESTON and include a portrait of the designer. The pictures are classified as follows: Of those representing Uncle Sam and the Priests there are 16; representing The Church Robbing the People, 2; Thanksgiving, 3; Sabbath Laws, 6; Children and the Church, 11; Woman and the Church, 10; The Church and Thomas Paine, 6; Studies in Natural History, 4; The Bible and Science, 2; The Clergy and Their Flocks, 15; Piety in Our Penitentiaries, 1; The Atonement Scheme, 4; The Lord and His Works, 4; Prayer, 2; The Creeds, 10; Christians and Mohammedans, 1; Samples of Christianity's Work, 2; Missionaries, 5; The Lord's Instruments, 1; Bible Doctrines and Their Results, 25; Church and Slavery, 1; Priests and Politics, 2; Ireland and the Church, 4; Church Ideas of Civilization, 2; Uses of the Cross, 1; Unkind Reflections on the Church, 4; Persecutions by the Church, 9; Some Allegories, 12; Heaven, 3; Hell, 6; Miscellaneous, 7.

This offer cannot apply to renewals. Premiums for them can be found on the second page of this issue. We are giving five dollars' worth for three in this offer, and there is no profit in it except that we shall get many renewals of these subscriptions; the subscribers will also, probably, buy a few books from time to time, and the small margin on them may make us whole. Induce your neighbor to subscribe, and so get the book for yourself. Or, if you are not now a subscriber, send us three dollars and get both paper and book—FIVE DOLLARS' WORTH FOR THREE DOLLARS.

Read what the papers and people have said of the book and see if it is not worth while to make a strong effort to obtain it. The book has had a large run; five thousand copies have been sold, and everyone who paid two dollars for it says it is worth a good deal more. Now we are giving it away, and you can get a copy if you will. Do not delay, but get it now.

What a New Subscriber, Who Has Received His Pictorial Text-Book, Says of It.

LAMAR, Mo., May 8, 1895.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: The "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book" is received, and after a careful examination of the work I unhesitatingly pronounce it one of the most impressive Freethought works ever issued from the press. It will indeed "corner the parson" and all his flock, and I shall take great pleasure in showing the book to my orthodox friends. As a reference book it is invaluable, and it should find a place in every Freethinker's library.

Respectfully, W. F. BRILEY.

When Renewing Your Subscription, Take Advantage of These Good Offers

For $6.50 we will send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year ($3) and S. P. Putnam's "Four Hundred Years of Freethought" ($5). Large Octavo, 1150 pages, gilt sides and back, marbled edges—the most magnificent work ever issued by the Freethought Press. 140 Half Tone Engravings of the Prominent Freethinkers of the past four centuries.

The object of this work is to present the Course of Freethought throughout the Civilized World from the time of Columbus and Bruno to the time of Ingersoll. It is a radical Historic Record of the greatest developments of the human race. It reveals Freethought as an intellectual, moral, literary, social, industrial, and political movement. It shows what Freethought is in itself, how manifold are its influences, and with what promise we can hail its future triumph. "FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT" embraces the most illustrious pages of human history, adorned with the brightest genius, radiant with the most splendid poetry, rich with the greatest inventions and discoveries, and ennobled with freedom's most shining advance. Nothing can be more interesting or more inspiring to the pioneer workers of to-day, to those who are still in the van for human rights and progress. No Liberal can afford to be without this book. It contains the greatest thoughts and the greatest deeds of the greatest men in one harmonious and magnificent whole, a vivid picture of man's sublimest evolution, with the added glory of woman's emancipation from the chains and slavery of a barbaric church.

Darwin and After Darwin

An Exposition of the Darwinian Theory.

By GEORGE J. ROMANES.

A systematic Exposition of what may be termed the Darwinism of Darwin, and intended to be of service to the general reader rather than to professional naturalists.

Mr. Romanes is well known as one of the most interesting of English writers upon evolution, besides ranking with Professor Huxley in scientific knowledge and ability. And this is a part of his conclusion regarding the great subject of Design, to which the church so often refers: "Thus whether we look to the facts of adaptation or to those of beauty, everywhere throughout organic nature we meet with abundant evidence of natural causation, while nowhere do we meet with any independent evidence of supernatural design. Adaptation and beauty are alike receiving their explanation at the hands of a purely mechanical philosophy. All nature has thus been transformed before the view of the present generation in a manner and to an extent that has never before been possible, and inasmuch as the change which has taken place has taken place in the direction of naturalism, and this to the extent of rendering the mechanical interpretation of nature universal, it is no wonder if the religious mind has suddenly awakened to a new and a terrible force in the words of its traditional enemy—Where is now thy God?"

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with a little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroine. The narrative is, in the main, a history of a working-girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business-men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrites. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Price, 25 cents. Address THE TRUTH SEEKER.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—We shall be obliged to our readers if they will send us the name and address of any Freethinker who is not a regular subscriber.

A few weeks ago we sent notices to those of our subscribers who were indebted to us on their subscription account, and we are glad to say that a great many of them kindly responded with promptness. There are many, however, from whom we have as yet had no word, and to them we address these appealing remarks. We want some money, and want it badly, else we wouldn't say anything about it. But the cost of getting out the paper has to be paid regularly, and it takes a good deal of cash. So we again ask those whose time has expired to make an effort to renew their subscriptions now—at once—right off—so we can have the wherewithal to pay some bills that are due. We owe some people, other people owe us. If other people will pay us, we can pay some people; and then everybody will be happy. (Quod erat demonstrandum.) It is very unpleasant to be short of funds with a great deal more owed us than we owe, but that is our fix now, and hence this reminder to those who forgot to respond to the notice. We dislike to mention this matter, but Necessity has no fellowship with Squeamishness, and we have to do it. We need the money.

The "Disturbance" Humbug.

On August 13th, John Mathews, a Seventh-Day Adventist, was tried at Ridgetown, Ontario, for violating the Sunday law by putting up hay on the farm of Mr. Watt, another Adventist. He was convicted, and the fine and costs, amounting to $20.65, he was ordered to pay within ten days from that date, with the alternative of thirty days' imprisonment if not paid. As Mr. Mathews positively refused to pay, there is no doubt he is in prison at this time. The trial was first set for Saturday, but Mr. Mathews is so sincere and determined that he refused to commit what he considered a violation of the Fourth commandment by attending court on that day. One of the witnesses testified that he was "disturbed" by the Sunday work of the accused, although when he stood at his gate at sundown while Mr. Mathews was raking hay in the meadow of Mr. Watts he was more than sixty rods from the culprit and there was a thick grove of maples between the sinner and the saint! That is a fair practical definition of "disturbance," as Sabbatarians understand it. At the same time, a dozen discordant pot-metal church bells, and a frenzied Free Methodist exhorter on every vacant lot in town, wouldn't cause their nerves to quiver even the least little bit. The prosecuting lawyer strenuously objected to the defense bringing in the Bible to prove that Saturday is the Sabbath of the Decalogue. He was wise in this, but when he said, "Let the statute settle which is the Lord's day," he virtually admitted that he had no case against Mr. Mathews, from the view-point of the Bible writers, and he also inferentially asserted that the legislature may interpret the Bible as it pleases, which would of course constitute the civil law-making power an ecclesiastical court. This is in accordance with the program of the theocratic managers.

To Make Christians Consistent.

The Christian Reformer is very much disturbed by the non-observance of "Sabbath." It is particularly agitated because Christians fail to do what it conceives to be their "duty" in this respect. The Second Brigade of Pennsylvania Home Guards went into camp at Glencairn, a short distance from Pittsburgh, and the railway ran Sunday excursions to the grounds. Says a Pittsburg daily:

"As the hours wore on toward noon the railroad out at Glencairn became a confused spectacle of railway coaches, blue uniforms, muskets, gay dresses, etc. After noon there seemed to be a continuous chain of trains, both north and south, and it is little short of wonderful that no accident marred the day's gaiety."

The Christian Reformer quotes this and sorrows publicly. We have a well-founded suspicion that it would have welcomed a terrible accident as a god-send in the way of a "warning." It laments that "all the paraphernalia of a picnic, fair, or Fourth of July celebration seems to have been present on this occasion."

"Of course religious services were held in five or six different places, conducted by as many ministers of the gospel, but this was a comparatively unimportant event, and had nothing to do with the drawing of so large a crowd [said to have numbered 30,000], except in cases where it acted as a salve to the consciences of professing Christians. The chief event of the day was the dress parade in the afternoon. It was this that most of the people went to see."

Where is "the power of God unto salvation" that, after about nineteen centuries of preaching of the gospel of the "Prince of Peace," it is found that in the eminently Christian state of Pennsylvania the services conducted by a half dozen of Christ's official representatives constitute "a comparatively unimportant event" having almost "nothing to do" with the drawing of a great crowd to the temple of the war god? Is it any wonder that the theocrats want to get Christ into the Constitution, when, as they say, they cannot get him into the hearts of their own people? It may be remarked in passing that a very large proportion of the people who attend regular church services do so merely to witness "the dress parade."

The Covenanter organ says that the presence of Governor Hastings at the encampment was an "official sanction" of "the wholesale desecration of the Sabbath." It was nothing of the kind, for the good and sufficient reason that church and state are constitutionally separate, and hence disregard of church observances and holy days by the officers of the state is in no sense official. Governor Hastings has no official political connection with the church. So far as belief in its dogmas and obedience to its rules are concerned, he is a private citizen.

Not only have the militiamen shocked the Sabbatarians in the Keystone state, but the Grand Army of the Republic has done likewise. It went into camp at Rock Point on Saturday, August 10th, and remained until the evening of Monday. The great feature of Sunday was the dress parade, and the Pennsylvania Railroad gave special excursion rates. Comments the Christian Reformer:

"What is popularly regarded as the spirit of patriotism directs its energies against the Sabbath, one of our most important civil and religious institutions. As a national defense the Sabbath is of far more value than the state militia or the G. A. R. We can get along without these fairly well, but we cannot exist as a free nation without the Sabbath."

"We cannot exist as a free nation without the Sabbath" means only that the Sabbatarians do not think themselves "free" unless they can compel everybody else to observe the Puritan Sabbath in the Puritan way. That is what they mean by "religious liberty." Like the Catholics, whom they inconsistently hate, they hold religious obligations to be above all civil and social obligations. Although made so by usurping legislators, the Sabbath cannot constitutionally be a law-enforced institution.

The Christian Reformer finds that the churches themselves participate in the work of Sabbath "desecration." Sometimes the managers of campmeetings make arrangements with the railroad companies to run excursion trains to the camps on Sunday and sometimes the railroads do so of their own volition. During July the Methodists held Pentecostal meetings at Ridgeview Park, Pennsylvania, and the railroad ran excursion trains to the grounds on Sunday. Says the Covenanter paper:

"Thus the forms of religion are made the occasion for wholesale Sabbath breaking. But the most absurd, grotesque, and iniquitous feature of the whole proceeding is the running of excursion trains on the Sabbath to Pentecostal revival meetings. The devil and his demons doubtless hold a jubilee when they can thus pervert religious services to their own ends. [Did not 'God' from the 'beginning' know that the Methodists would do this and that the devilish jubilee would come off per schedule?] What a spectacle is presented when ostensibly for the advancement of religion the sacred institution of the Sabbath is thus trampled upon! Doubtless individuals are sometimes blessed with the baptism of the spirit at such meetings, but for every one so blessed, thousands are cursed by reason of the desecration of the Sabbath. [If a man does not 'desecrate' the Sabbath when he walks three miles to a Pentecostal meeting, where is the desecration when the railroad train carries him and others at a far less expenditure of energy and time per man?] Church members do not feel their responsibility for the preservation of the Sabbath as they should. Consistent loyalty to the Lord of the Sabbath requires separation from this sin. But it is clear that nothing short of statute law properly enforced will meet the necessities of the case as set forth above."

Italics are ours. This is a plain and unequivocal demand that the state shall enforce the discipline of the church. And yet tricky theocrats vehemently assert that they are utterly opposed to the union of church and state! Manifestly, only the members of a church are under ethical obligation to observe the rites and ceremonies of that church. The church is a voluntary association entirely apart from the state, and as such makes its own rules, which it must enforce without the assistance of the civil powers. And it can compel none but its own members to obey its regulations. Yet here we have the Christian Reformer demanding that the state shall not only act as a disciplinary board of the church, but shall outrage justice and deny liberty by compelling all who do not accept the church's regulations to abjectly obey them! Could insolence be more insulting? Could criminal intent be more menacing?

This is one more sweeping demonstration of the utter falsity of the claim made by the more timid Sabbath worshipers that they are working for a "civil" Sabbath law only, that they do not wish to hav Sunday statutes enacted or enforced on religious grounds. The truth is that no one would have seriously urged making honest work and innocent recreation crimes on Sunday had it not been for the desire of the church to secure a monopoly of that day.

Law to Take the Place of Faith.

Rev. Jesse S. Gilbert, writing in the Michigan Advocate, laments the decay of the emotional in religion. He says:

"Seldom do we any more see the mental anguish, the prolonged and desperate struggle, with the corresponding exultation and ecstasy, that marked the conversions of the olden time. Men are convicted without anguish and converted without rapture. The kingdom of heaven is no longer stormed with prayers, tears, and strong cries, as though to be taken by very force. . . . The decay of the emotional is seen in all the after phases of Christian life. The 'amen' corner has fallen into 'innocuous desuetude.' The class-room is well-nigh deserted. Preaching is largely argumentative and apologetic. As fervor diminishes, forms increase; hence responsive readings, Lord's Prayer, chants and amens no longer shouted out by happy saints, but rendered in the highest style of operatic art by trained and paid choirs."

Men are enthusiastic, they feel deeply and express themselves fervently, only when they have positive convictions, when they believe without doubts that great consequences depend upon certain actions. The blind faith of the early devotees is gone, never to return. Men no longer realize hell; if they believe in it at all it is in a traditional, conventional way that does not bring the horrible implications of the monstrous doctrine home to their consciousness. With most Christians, of even ordinary intelligence, it is now merely an inherited theory that does not make much of an impression, even at a "revival" meeting. Mr. Gilbert perceives this, for he says that in other matters people are as emotional as ever; "in politics, business, and the pursuit of pleasure mankind were never more susceptible to emotion than they are at the present time." It should be said here that men are in earnest and grow enthusiastic about those concerns in which they are the most deeply interested. They are to-day more interested in business, politics, and pleasure than they are in religion. Mr. Gilbert declares that the fact that the people are still very emotional in other departments of life proves that the decline of the emotional in religion is not due to "an increased education and culture." In this he is mistaken. Increased facilities for education and greater opportunities for enjoyment of life have marvelously weakened the intensity of belief in the old dogmas, and lessened the desire for the "consolations" of religion. In a word, education and invention have given men and women other matters to think about and other work to do. Rev. Mr. Gilbert now comes to the heart of the difficulty:

"Why, then, is the emotional so largely ignored in the religious life of to-day? The answer is not far to find. Worldly conformity has chilled the warm current of devotion, and substituted a formal respectability for old-time fervor. The subtle spirit of doubt with which the very air seems charged, and which so largely permeates modern literature, has weakened the faith of many. The truths of Christianity, when firmly believed and in any measure realized, tend to excite. Men cannot believe that they themselves, or that others, are upon the brink of an eternal hell, and remain unmoved. Judgment, eternity, responsibility, sin, and redemption, are all truths calculated to arouse. A return to the old paths is the only course that will awaken the cold hearts and the hardened conscience. There must be clear conviction, or there can be no conversion. A mighty baptism of the Holy Ghost will rekindle the fire upon the altars of the church, turn timid Elises into faithful Elijahs, and many a doubting Thomas into a courageous Peter. More than anything else does the church need this baptism of power from on high, Pentecost restored."

Yes, it is "doubt" that has "weakened the faith" of the masses as well as opened the way for the establishment of the scientific certitude of the few. It was the belief in the reality of a hell of actual fire that enabled the ignorant and the cultivated alike to make that "spiritual use of the imagination" of which Professor Romanes told us. Mr. Gilbert has admitted, what the Infidel has claimed, that hell was the driving power of the Christian machine. If the church would have the world "return to the old paths," if it would have again "a mighty baptism of the Holy Ghost," it must bring upon the stage of action a generation imbued with a "clear conviction" of the truth of the dogma of an eternal hell of agony for all who cannot accept the Bible as the infallible revelation of God's will. The first step in this direction is to make the people submissive to "law as law"; once that form of fetish worship has become a habit, the church can galvanize her dead creeds into a semblance of life in the Constitution and laws of the country and punish as law-breakers all who refuse to bow the knee at her shrines. This would eventually give her the control of the schools and the press and enable her to again bring upon the world a thousand years of intellectual and moral night. This is the "movement in favor of ignorance" that to-day is sweeping everything before it in the political field. This is the meaning of the Sabbatarian crusade, of the God in the Constitution campaign, of the Comstock postal statutes and all similar legislation, of the prohibition revolt, and of every other scheme ostensibly intended to make the individual good and happy by a "Be it Enacted" of the legislature. The leaders of the church are too astute to openly proclaim all their designs, but they know that if they can get into the law, under any specious pretext whatever, what they want in the law, they can get the law enforced to the advantage of the church by an appeal to the silly superstition of reverence for law "because it is law" which they are so assiduously cultivating. The easy successes they are winning this year show how the poison has already penetrated the minds of a large portion of the people. But the Freethinkers are not deceived; they, if no others, know the old enemy of justice and liberty and are not to be beguiled by fine moralistic pretenses. They know that the church must win back through the state, if she wins it back at all, the empire she lost through biblical criticism and science. In the light of this knowledge they perceive the trend of the "reform" movements in which the church is interested. When will the press of the country acquire equal clearness of vision?

"Many of those who repudiate the immortality of the soul and contend that all ends at the grave, will yet recognize their error to their dire cost."—Catholic Union and Times.

And so your "just" God will eternally torture those of his children who, with the brains he gave them, could not in their brief lives learn all the laws of the nature with which he endowed them?

"A man named Francis Schlader, who lives in Albuquerque, claims to be Jesus Christ. Schlader is in a fair way to play an engagement on the chain-gang."—Galveston News.

Would the New Mexican Christians put Jesus Christ in the chain-gang if his "second coming" should materialize at this time? How do they know Schlader is not the veritable Christ? Would they know Christ if he should come?

The religious papers which have attempted to justify the persecution of the Adventists in Tennessee are, according to the American Sentinel's list, five in number, and they are all Baptist papers. Roger Williams, the Baptist, was banished from Massachusetts because he opposed the doctrine that civil magistrates should inflict punishment for religious error, his objection to Sabbath laws being especially pronounced. The Baptists are certainly "degenerates."

Supreme Court Justice Gaynor, when asked if he was a candidate for mayor of Brooklyn, answered: "We are all in the hands of providence, and providence put me where I am without any seeking or effort on my part." There are quite a number of voters who were instruments in the hands of providence in putting the Justice where he is, but who will be guilty of no more such foolishness. They did not know last fall who was the "boss" of the machine that was running Gaynor; they know now, thanks to Mr. Gaynor's modest frankness.

The Catholic Review says that "it is very possible that some wealthy Catholics, who have front pews in church, will have hot holes in hell for their injustice to the laborer and the poor." What! Has it come to this, that even Catholicism is losing so much of the genuine grace of Christian faith that a man's belief will not save him? Truly, civilization is doing its perfect work. Perhaps some day the Catholic will admit that even the Atheist who is good to the laborer and the poor can see heaven. If faith will not save bad Catholics from hell, why should lack of faith keep good Atheists out of heaven?

"Policeman John J. O'Brien arrested Corwando Locoto, a barber at No. 1483 Park avenue, for shaving a man yesterday at 1:40 p.m., and took him to the East One Hundred and Fourth Street Station House. The sergeant sent the man to a cell, and, turning to the reporter who was there, said: 'Now, if you know anything meaner for me to do than that, tell me and we'll do it.'"
—New York World.

And no doubt he would—such slaves would burn their own mothers at the stake for heresy if only a priest-inspired "law" had been violated. They are stone-blind to their duties as men and representatives of justice.

"The question of righteousness should never decide whether an existing law is to be enforced or not. Is it the law of the land? That question settled in the affirmative, then let the law be enforced. If the law is unjust, if it works hardship to innocent persons, still let it be executed so long as it remains upon the statute books."—Rev. Thomas C. Warner, D.D., Memphis.

If you really believe what you say, why do you denounce the Jews for the crucifixion of Jesus? If you really believe what you say, why do you, as a Protestant, declaim against the law-sanctioned atrocities of the Inquisition? Reverend Sir, you are either stupid or insincere, and in either case you are utterly unfit to be a teacher of the people. But the friends of justice may well thank you for exhibiting the fiendish doctrine of your class in all its naked horror. You are logical, at least, for you perceive and proclaim that righteousness, that equity, that justice, are less than dust in the balance when weighed against the demands made for your fetish.

"To-day all science, all philosophy and all religion in the minds of its interpreters, conspire to show us what a profound faith has been reached by any man who can sincerely say: 'I accept the universe.' Best of all we believe the number of those who are getting some glimpses of this faith and are thus preparing to accept it is increasing."—J. C. L., in the New Unity.

If by this it is meant that to "accept the universe" is to admit that all the operations of nature are in harmony with the ethical ideal of the most developed men and women, then we freely concede that the faith which can do that is indeed "profound"; it is simply abysmal and unfathomable in its depth. Below that self-deception could not go. The more sensitive the individual becomes, the more fully he can put himself in the place of the one who suffers, the less is he inclined to accept the universe as morally perfect. When the man who "accepts the universe" as morally perfect, and the creation of an infinitesimal and ethical intelligence, finds it necessary to imprison and judicially murder his fellows for the infraction of the rules of social order, he furnishes the most crushing answer to his own untenable theory.

The New Unity thinks that few of its readers "will question the importance of a unitary conception of life." We fear that that is true, but we hope that some of them will call to mind the fact that when the Christian world had such a "unitary conception of life" the instincts of mercy and truth were almost racked and burned out of the Western races. We to-day possess a small measure of freedom, owing to the fact that the various sects into which Christianity is divided cannot enforce a "unitary conception of life." Freedom is the essential condition of all progress, and until the majority learns to sacredly respect the rights of the minority the only guarantee of liberty and the only security for life is the multiplication of warring sects. It would afford us unqualified delight if from this day forward no two Christians could agree on a creed for a church, no two citizens could build a political platform upon which both could stand. Then men and women could seek truth without danger of persecution, then the civil association would confine its labors to the protection of the individual from invasion. It seems to us that the self-styled "Liberal Christian" has read history to no useful end whatever.

"We have a law, and by our law he ought to die," has been the justification of injustice and persecution in all ages," tersely says the American Sentinel. The most astonishing phenomenon in connection with the clamor for the enforcement of law "because it is law," regardless of the justice or injustice of the law, is the religious and political worship rendered by the clamorers to the law-breakers of the past. There was scarcely a man or woman whose memory they honor who did not nobly condemn one or many of the iniquitous laws of the time. Those splendid rebels held, as we do, that justice is essential and abiding, statute law incidental and ephemeral. They held, as we do, that there are sacred precincts of personality into which no power, be it czar or majority, can rightfully force its way. The Constitution of the United States was framed to guard those sacred precincts. All Sabbath laws are invasive defiances of that Constitution and have the old-junk value only of the paper upon which they are printed. This is the plain truth in a nutshell, all fetish worshipers to the contrary notwithstanding.

"We know kind hearts who never hear a poor sermon; they are such intent listeners that they put merit into a poor discourse; ability to listen to a sermon is a mark of civilization. Heathens cannot."—The Central Baptist.

Maybe that was intended for a witticism. Perhaps it was written in all seriousness. Anyway, it may be true that ability to listen to a Christian sermon is a mark of Christian civilization. Certainly only persons with very "kind hearts" could listen patiently week after week and year after year to sermons of the average merit or lack of merit, unless the hearts were engaged in pumping very thin blood into very weak thinkers. We have seen men and women sitting under the "droppings of the sanctuary" and gazing into the face of the preacher with an expression on their countenances which said that they were "taking in" every word he uttered as the infallible deliverance of an oracle, while the simple truth was that the whole sermon was an insipid, a pointless rehash of unprovable assertions, utterly lacking in logic and unsupported by a single demonstrable fact, a discourse, in short, which would have discredited the ability of a smart boy of twelve. They were listening with rapt attention, not because they were putting "merit into a poor discourse," but because they did not know what merit was. They knew less than the preacher and so were not bored.

At Crawfordsville, Indiana, the Sunday law is enforced so impartially that not even a prescription can be filled at the drug stores, and the mayor announced on August 20th that thereafter not even the gas company would be allowed to operate. The shutting off of the gas would not make much difference, for the darkness at Crawfordsville could not be greatly increased by blotting out the sun and moon. In Mount Vernon, New York, the barbers have not been disposed to obey the new barber Sunday closing law. On a Sunday in August the shops were raided. One policeman was knocked down by a patron as he attempted to enter Michael George's shop. Several city officials, among others, were found in the shops and were all taken to the police station, some only partly shaved. When the cases were called for trial, one of the men, a deputy sheriff, could not remember whether he had been shaved that day, and was held for perjury. The chief of police threatened to have the whole force watching the shops the next Sunday. Here we see the entire corps of peace officers diverted from their legitimate work and transformed into the persecutors of honest laborers. This is idiocy and criminality mixed in about equal proportions, and yet supposedly sane and honest men hold up their hands in approval of the enforcement of this damnable law, "because it is law."

"The laws against the violation of our day of rest are unrepealed, and no matter whether just or unjust, wise or unwise, . . . they should be enforced."—Memphis Commercial Appeal.

It may interest the student of hypocrisy to know that the paper which thus flippantly places a statute enacted by church-driven legislators above justice, itself publishes a Sunday edition for dollars and cents, thus wilfully trampling upon a law that it declares should be remorselessly enforced against conscientious Adventists. Such creatures as the publishers of the Memphis paper have sounded the depths of human depravity. They could not go lower if they tried. Commenting on the Commercial Appeal's vindictive hypocrisy, the American Sentinel very justly says: "This sentiment is worthy of an inquisitor of the 'Holy Office,' and had the editor of that paper lived in the days of the Inquisition, he would, if consistent, have said: 'The laws against the violation of our religion are unrepealed, and whether just or unjust, wise or unwise, they should be enforced.' Yea, he would have stood by and seen the cruel, red-hot pincers sear and tear the flesh of the tortured victim; or, perchance, he would have himself heated the instruments of torture or brutally bared the breast of the shrinking maiden or the devoted mother to the gaze of the rabble and to the bloody work of the scarcely more cruel iron." All that is needed to reestablish the Inquisition is for the church to get enacted, under any pretense whatever, anti-heretical laws. That done, the blind believers in the enforcement of law "because it is law" will help her put them into execution, no matter how bloody and cruel the means that may have to be employed, no matter what the cost in property, liberty, and life.

"Benedict Arnold was not less intelligent than George Washington, but one betrayed his country and the other saved it. Robert Ingersoll is as well informed in some departments of learning as William E. Gladstone. One is a brilliant blasphemer, who, for a consideration of a few hundred dollars a night, will denounce Christ as a trickster and the Bible as the most infamous book in the universe. The other is a Christian gentleman, a man whom a nation's treasury could not bribe, nor a nation's wrath turn from the path of duty."—Rev. Dr. J. B. Hawthorne, Baptist, of Atlanta.

Dr. Hawthorne manifests the customary courtesy of the clergyman, but he has made a mistake in paralleling his comparison of Colonel Ingersoll and Mr. Gladstone with that of Arnold and Washington. Washington was not a church member and appears to have held only a formal allegiance to Christianity, while on the other hand, so far as we know, no one has ever questioned the orthodoxy of Arnold. For the rest, it is not necessary to disparage the character of Mr. Gladstone in order to give due credit to the many virtues of Colonel Ingersoll. Free-thinkers criticize the expressed religious opinions of the English statesman; they do not attack him as a man. Dr. Hawthorne should know that it is unmanly to insinuate that Colonel Ingersoll could be bribed by the promise of national preferment and emolument, or made to hide his honest convictions through fear of the disapproval of the masses. Had he been amenable to such influences he would not, with the brilliant political career that was possible to him, have taken the position that he did on the subject of religion. Will the Atlanta minister tell us wherein Colonel Ingersoll fails to be as worthy a man as Mr. Gladstone, leaving out of consideration his heterodoxy, which the clergyman is bound to think a mortal sin? And again: Where has Colonel Ingersoll called the Bible "the most infamous book in the universe"? He has indeed said that some of the crimes therein attributed to Yahveh were infamous, as they were, but that is not branding the book as infamous. He has pointed out some of its imperfections and showed that an imperfect book could not come from a perfect author. The Bible is human, not divine, in its origin, and hence is fallible. So long as Christians claim that it is infallible they will be confronted by Free-thinkers who will prove that it is fallible. That is the offense of Mr. Ingersoll. Finally, it is true that the Freethought lecturer receives pay for his lectures and books, but we are not informed that Dr. Hawthorne declines to draw his salary, which, it is fairly to be assumed, is as large as his talents will command.

Hypnotism has recently been introduced as a defense in cases of criminal invasion, but it now seems that the Pauline principle of the headship of the husband may prove to be more useful in some instances. In Williamsburg, a suburb of Brooklyn, Mrs. Maggie Strippel was brought to the bar in Justice Murphy's court for having punched, kicked, and pulled the hair of Mrs. Alice Whalen, another tenant in the same building. Mrs. Whalen testified that just before she was assaulted she heard Mr. Strippel tell his wife to give her, the witness, "a licking." This dialog ensued:

"Did you do this?" inquired Justice Murphy of Mrs. Strippel.

"Yes, your honor," she said, slowly, after having stood in silence for nearly a minute. "My husband ordered me to do it."

"If that's the case," said the justice, cheerfully, "you're a dutiful wife, and I'll dismiss the case and discharge you."

From which we gather that it is the "duty" of the wife to obey her husband to the extent of committing crime when he commands it. This is a logical deduction from the Pauline doctrine, and no loyal Christian can find fault with it, but why did it not occur to the antediluvian justice to order the arrest of Strippel as the principal, and punish him for the offense perpetrated by his minion in pursuance of his orders? If a married woman is not a unit, if she is not responsible for what her husband commands her to do, then he, as the "head of the family," should be made to answer for her torts and trespasses. Blessed be the Bible! How greatly it has contributed to the emancipation of women and the humanization of police justices! Let us put it in the Constitution. We want more such decisions as that of Justice Murphy.

Our Missionary Work.

Several of our good friends have written us that in their opinion the work, "Self Contradictions of the Bible," should go along with Paine's "Age of Reason" as a missionary pamphlet. Mr. J. R. Perry puts it thus: "As a missionary document the 144 Self Contradictions will go hand in hand with the 'Age of Reason.' I think any person getting the one will get the other. It is the grubbing process, clearing out the roots and stones, necessary to preparing the soil for good seeds of common sense." And as it is our delight to furnish the implements for this sort of agricultural operations, we are willing to do our part and will send the "Self Contradictions of the Bible" to those who will distribute it among their Christian friends, FOR A DOLLAR A DOZEN. Or we will send twelve copies to as many different addresses for one dollar.

Now let the friends of Freethought turn to and circulate "Self Contradictions" as well as the "Age of Reason." Send both books out by the thousand and watch the result. Flood the country with them, and let the Christians know what their holy paper fetish, the Bible, is like and why it is worthless as a guide to any good.

THE TRUTH SEEKER's offer to send eight copies of Paine's "Age of Reason" to eight different addresses for $1, to be used for missionary purposes, is still open. The best results are reported from this method of reaching intelligent believers and giving a new direction to their thoughts.

Last Chance to Obtain a Rare Book.

David Friedrich Strauss's "Life of Jesus Critically Examined" was first published in two volumes for $9. The edition ran out, and another was issued in one volume for $4.50. This edition is almost exhausted, less than fifty copies being in existence. Of what are left we have obtained a share, and can furnish them postpaid at the last price, $4.50. They will not last long, and we advise those of our friends who want a copy to send at once. When these are gone there will be no more to be had. This edition is translated from the fourth German edition by George Eliot, and contains 784 large octavo pages of solid reading, very clearly printed. It is unnecessary to say to students that this is a very valuable work, one which the church wishes had never been written, but which it cannot controvert.

News and Notes.

Paris is not like London. It is a different evolution of the human race. It has other roots of life, and other meaning to the traveler, to the artist, to the thinker. It could not be transformed to London, any more than London could be transformed to Paris. Both are necessary to the complete manifestation of the civilization of the Old World, and in both, we might say, are contained all the elements of the intelligence and energy of Europe. London is life itself; Paris is the cream of life. London is like a sea; Paris is like a flowing river. London is the place of business, of trade, of commerce, of capital. It is the mart of all the earth. Every production of the planet finds its center in London, which is a huge magnet of attraction to every ship, to every mine, to every factory, to every field and rolling stream. The docks of London are a marvel in themselves. We are astonished at the magnitude of the transactions here. They are colossal in the instruments used; in the vast wealth that is constantly changing hands. From remotest quarters of the globe pour in a thousand riches.

Paris is not at all like this. It has not the thunder, the roar, the vibration, the immensity of London. It has not the profound, the immeasurable sweep of enormous forces. Paris is the city of glory and happiness; the city of beauty and delight. Here we see the perfection of art, of pleasure, of ornament. Here we see the joy of life; not the burden, the toil, the struggle; but the bloom—the gorgeous flower; the polished jewel; man “full summed in all his powers.”

There is no comparison between London and Paris. You cannot judge one by the other. Each has its own standard. Each is a law unto itself, representing absolutely different conditions of humanity. We might say that Shakspeare represents the English mind in its variability, energy, profuseness, brilliancy, and practical common sense, and intense love of home and soil. So the French mind is represented by the wonderful Voltaire. How different from Shakspeare is Voltaire! Yet what a world he reveals of thought, of wit and splendor, of noble philosophy and heroic action. There is a lightness, a brightness, and what Carlyle terms a persiflage in Voltaire, which we do not find in the Englishman, and which is pre-eminently distinctive of the genius of France, and which, to my mind, does not make it any the less glorious or beneficent. It is a relief to the gloom and tragedy of existence. It is a sort of intellectual carelessness without which our hearts would break at the awful sorrows we experience. Certainly French literature has gifted the world as no other literature has, giving piquancy to art, to philosophy, to labor itself, which illuminates and electrifies. Where is anything like the comedies of Molière, the romances of Voltaire, the novels of Balzac, the poetry of Hugo, and the vivid, palpitating, earnest realism of Zola, the greatest of living writers, who, from the very dust, evolves the brilliant and the beautiful of human life, and teaches wisdom from the most common details? And in Freethought, in reform, in the battle for human rights, what a history does France present; what radiance in the darkness of the past; what achievements out of mighty sufferings and rebellion; what happy hope and tranquil industry for the ages to come.

With these thoughts surging in my mind, memories and prophecies, dreams and exultations, I touch the deep heart of France in the magnificence of its great capital.

Fortunately, I am not alone. I have good English comrades with me, Mr. and Mrs. George Ward, Miss Robbins, Mrs. Hancock, Mr. and Mrs. George Standing, and Mr. Harry Jones, and by their companionship and knowledge I am piloted through the crowding varieties of this resplendent city.

I leave London on Friday, August 2d, and take the route by way of New Haven and Dieppe, which is altogether the pleasantest route from London to Paris. You see more of the country, and have a smoother sail over the sea. The rich English scenery is about us, glowing with harvest, as we whirl on the express to New Haven. It is a bit stormy when we plunge into the watery path for Dieppe, and it looks as if the rain would pour and give us a rough passage on the crowded steamer. But soon the clouds roll off, the bright sun appears, the billows sweep softly, and we escape sea-sickness and enjoy the glory of the blue and shining ocean beneath a radiant sky. Soon along the misty horizon we behold the hills of France, and the lofty cathedral and houses of Dieppe. We sweep into its harbor between two high images of the crucifixion, placed on either shore, and of course this preserves us from all harm. But it was funny, after all, to see these two solemn crosses towering in the midst of busy traffic and travel. I don't think a single passenger took off his hat to these religious emblems.

We are soon on the train for Paris, and we pass through lovely Normandy, beautiful after the showers that had passed over it. There was a glittering freshness in the unfolding sceneries. It was sunny France, indeed, that spread its fields and woods about us, adorned with cottages and chateaus. I felt that I was coming into a domain where a new and sprightly genius was reigning. There was not the solidity of England, but a grace and felicity in the very landscape itself that suggested a contrasting race with a vitality all its own. Far away could be seen cultivated farms, the sheen of harvest, the dark beauty of groves, the winding river, the bridges, the boats, the towers and domes and dwellings. The first great city we reach is Rouen. It has a population of about 112,000. It is an important manufacturing place. It is sometimes called the Manchester of France. It is the richest of French cities in medieval architecture. Its old walls and old houses are being destroyed, and it is putting on a modern appearance. Here was the tower in which Joan of Arc was imprisoned and the castle where she was tried, and the Place de la Pucelle, the traditional scene of her burning in 1431. Here is the house in which Corneille was born, 1606, which dwelling is now public property. I enjoy a beautiful view of Rouen as we approach on the railroad. The bed of the railroad is elevated, and the city is stretched out before us in a spacious and handsome valley, where the river shines between the houses. The cathedral, the palace of justice, and other imposing public buildings are seen, together with the many factories. I have not time to remain and view this most ancient city; I must speed on to Paris.

It is raining like cats and dogs when we get to Paris, an extraordinary thing for this country. We have a deal of trouble to get to our hotel, for we don't find a single cabman who can speak English; and if we try to talk French, it's no use, for we can't get the pronunciation. No matter how you may try to twist your tongue you fail, and the ordinary cabman is too stupid even to catch your meaning. But finally we are landed in what is called an English hotel, but nobody in it speaks English. However, we found an interpreter in one of the lodgers, and so settled affairs. We afterwards found an English restaurant, where they did speak English, and we felt quite at home, especially after we had had a good round of English beefsteak and satisfied our hunger. Also at a café we found a waiter who said he had crossed the ocean forty-two times, and he could speak English, French, German, etc. The next day we met George Standing and afterwards Mr. Harry Jones; and they could speak French enough to get along quite comfortably. We had no further trouble about language. If one can pronounce about a hundred French words correctly, that is all he needs for traveling purposes; say, for instance, the names of the principal buildings and streets, the names of things to eat and things to drink, and the names of coins, and a few verbs. You are all right then, and the pleasure is, that you need not converse with the waiter, the barber, the driver, or “boots.” There is some advantage in a limited vocabulary.

Saturday we walk along the boulevards, where so much of the life of Paris can be observed in the multitudes that pass by. We reach the Arc de Triomphe de l'Etoile, the largest triumphal arch in existence, visible from almost every part of the environs of Paris. It was begun by Napoleon in 1806, and completed by Louis Philippe in 1836. The arch is 67 feet high and 46 feet wide. The whole structure is 160 feet in height, and 146 feet in width. The arch and pillars are adorned with colossal trophies of the many wars of France. Twelve avenues or great boulevards radiate from this magnificent point, the greatest and most illustrious of which is the Champs Elysées, the noblest boulevard, I guess, in the world. I shall say “guess” hereafter, for the more I travel the less certain I am that things are so, however much they may seem to be so. It may be true that somewhere there is a more splendid avenue than Champs Elysées, but at present I do not believe it. It is one and one-third miles in length from the Place de la Concorde to the Arc de Triomphe. It is flanked with handsome buildings, and the center is adorned with elms and lime-trees. Innumerable crowds throng this immense highway, especially in the evening hours, and the splendor of it all is indescribable. Wonderfully lively is the Place de la Concorde, with its lights, its illuminated groves, its open-air concerts, the fountains, the carriages, etc. I can only give a hint of these Parisian glories.

We stroll next to the woods of Boulogne, a beautiful forest covering an area of 2,250 acres. It was long the resort of duelists, suicides, and robbers. Down to 1848 it received but little attention. In 1852 it was presented to the municipality, and it has since been a favorite promenade. There is nothing like it in London, New York, or any other city I ever was in. Almost in a moment you are transported into the depths of country life. The woods are thick, and all sorts of rural prospects are presented as you traverse them—glades, leafy arches, winding paths, greenswards, and here and there beautiful open spaces, without a sign of any dwelling. I believe you could walk for miles in these woods at times and not see a human being. I was astonished at the solitude, so sweet and profound, on the verge of this mighty metropolis. Through the radiant shadows we walk on to the Grand Cascade, a waterfall issuing from a grotto. From an eminence a little before it is a fine view of the Seine; to the left is St. Cloud, nearer is the Hippodrome de Longchamp, the principal race-course of Paris; opposite are a mill with two towers and the remains of the ancient Abbey of Longchamp, with the village of Suresnes beyond, and a little further off Mont Valerian. Suresnes is the village where the wedding parties come for a dinner and jolly time, so vivaciously described by Zola. We see the merry troops coming and going, full of happiness, ready for the wine, and music, and dancing. Picturesque, indeed, is the little village, as we wander over its motley streets, sparkling with the merriment of a varied assemblage, ever moving about, eating, drinking, singing, and loving, as bride and husband go dashing by.

We then take boat for Paris along the river Seine. The city unfolds with ever-changing splendor. St. Cloud, with its fountains, appears where the old palace stood. The palace in which Napoleon III. exploited his royalty is now vanished for ever. We pass by the great Eiffel Tower, which rears itself a thousand feet aloft, the ruins of the palace of the Council of State, and underneath the thronged bridges. We land and visit Notre Dame, around whose venerable walls Paris began many centuries ago. This cathedral is on an island in the heart of the city. We walk within its storied gloom. It was founded in 1163, on the site of a church of the fourth century. The towers are 223 feet high. The view from the top is one of the finest in the city, embracing the course of the Seine, with its numerous bridges, the public buildings, etc. After the church we visit the morgue. What a study of man is here!—the darkness, the terror of life, its loneliness, its desolation, its despair. From thence we bend our way to where once stood the Bastille. It is all gone. Not a rack is left behind. Only a few circular stones in the pavement tell the story of its existence. The site is now crowded with business. Ten thousand feet now hurry along where once was the lonely prisoner. The column of July here towers into the glorious sunshine in honor of the heroes who fell in the Revolution of 1830.

Sunday is too stormy to take train for Versailles, about twelve miles from Paris. In the alternate rain and shine we visit the garden of the Tuileries, the statue of Gambetta, the Place du Carrousel, etc. Thence to the Hotel des Invalides, with its conspicuous gilded dome, a vast establishment occupying an area of about thirty acres. The tomb of Napoleon is beneath the dome, in an open circular crypt. The walls are of polished slabs of granite, adorned with marble reliefs. On the pavement are recorded the names of the battles and victories of Napoleon. The mosaic represents a wreath of laurels. The sarcophagus is a single huge block of reddish-brown granite, fourteen feet high, thirteen feet long, and weighing sixty-seven tons, beautiful and massive in appearance, befitting the grave of the mightiest warrior of modern times. Above the grave rises the dome to a height of 160 feet. In front of the chapel appears a gigantic image of Jesus crucified—a strange combination indeed. From the windows the blue and golden tint falls upon the cross and figure, giving a somewhat ghastly aspect to the solemn grandeur of the scene. It fills one with awe to behold these colossal images and trophies, but I could not help saying to myself: “This is a lie and not a truth. This pageantry is not for the service of man. It is the incarnation of ambition and superstition.”

In the afternoon we visit Vincennes and St. Maude. From the top of the tramway we view the Palais de Justice, the Tribunal de Commerce, the Hotel-Dieu, the Place de Chatelet, the Hotel de Ville. We roll into the boulevard Henri IV., and thence into the Rue de Faubourg St. Antoine of sanguinary and revolutionary fame. What a mighty history is connected with this volcanic thoroughfare, teeming still with rebellious spirits! We reach the Place de la Nation, which forms the eastern extremity of Paris. At St. Maude a Sunday fête is going on. It is a curious sight. All sorts of exhibitions are there—entertainments, music, sleight-of-hand, mesmerism, theaters, dancing, and varieties too numerous to mention. It is a picture of the way the working people of Paris enjoy themselves. They are in favor of a lot of fun, they are not squeamish in their methods, and they don't believe in a solemn Sunday.

Monday, all the places of exhibition, the Louvre, etc., are closed. It is "cleaning up" day. This is sensible, to keep open on Sunday and close on Monday for repairs.

We visit Pere-Lachaise, the largest burial ground in Paris. It covers an area of 160 acres. It is in the northeast part of the city, on one of its loftiest elevations. The number of monuments in this vast necropolis is 20,000. There are memorials of many illustrious persons—Abelard and Heloise, Rachel, Chopin, Talma, Marshal Ney, Laplace, Balzac, Comte. It is impossible to enumerate the celebrated dead. Entering this wonderful cemetery, the mausoleum of thousands, we feel what Wordsworth so beautifully sings

There is
One great society alone on earth
The noble living and the noble dead.

I have never been in a cemetery like this before. There is nothing like it in England or America that I know of by report or actual vision. It is beautiful. There is awe, and yet attraction, in its solemn glory. It is indeed a city of the dead. Never did the phrase, "City of the Dead," seem so appropriate. There are no head-stones or monuments, such as we have in our cemeteries. The bodies are placed in a deep vault, from ten to twenty in each, I should judge, and then over these vaults are built beautiful little temples, with every variety of architecture and sculpture, lovely and sublime, so that, as you enter the cemetery, it seems as if you were entering a beautiful marble city, with noble avenues and glorious trees that bend over and drop sweet music as you wander on and on in gentle and poetic melancholy, soothed by the sad loveliness of the entrancing scene, filled with thoughts of the immortal dead, seeing the richness of the present world in the glory of that which has vanished forever. I visited the graves of the Anarchists and Communists in a lonely part of the cemetery where they perished, with the red wreaths still flinging their somber splendor over the scene. Blindly and madly as they fought and died, with the bloody banner over them, even they represented something of the eternal worth of man and his heroic spirit. Let the evil be forgotten, and the true and beautiful survive in the majestic gloom of death.

From the lofty central portion of Pere-Lachaise is a commanding view of the city, and as I looked forth upon the vast and thronging world of the living, glittering far away with myriad lustres, I could but feel that the dead were still with us in the deeds they wrought; in the thoughts they uttered. From the past comes the bloom of to-day. The old must ever mingle with the new.

We have to make the most of our time at Paris, and arise at half-past six o'clock, and, like the busy bee, "improve each shining hour," for time and fortune only permit us to remain until Wednesday morning. When we die we hope, like every good American, to go to Paris. In the meantime, however, we must make the most of the life that now is. Before breakfast we visit the Palais-Royal; the Rue de Rivoli, one of the most important streets of Paris, named in honor of Napoleon's victory over the Austrians; the Rue du Pont-Neuf; the Madeleine, with its imposing colonnade of Corinthian columns; the Place de la Concorde, the finest in the world, 390 yards in length, and 235 yards in width, bounded by the Seine, the Champ Elysées, and the garden of the Tuileries. From it are ample views of the Madeleine, the Chamber of Deputies, the Champ Elysées, and the Triumphal Arch.

In 1792 the guillotine began its bloody work here. Louis XVI. was executed 1793, Charlotte Corday was beheaded, Marie Antoinette suffered the death penalty, Danton also, Anacharsis Cloots, and Robespierre. Over 2,000 persons have perished here by the guillotine. The bloody past was sought to be forgotten, and when the Obelisk of Luxor was presented by Mehemet Ali the name Place de la Concorde was finally given, and in the beauty and grandeur of art and industry the terrible memories vanish away.

We also visit the Hall Centrales, one of the most interesting and lively places in Paris, a vast structure, chiefly of iron. The "halls" consist of ten pavilions, between which run covered streets. The whole building fills a space of twenty-two acres. It is the great market center of Paris. An immense business is transacted every morning. It is estimated that 15,000 vehicles are employed in the traffic. The supplies include fish, poultry, game, oysters, frogs, snails, vegetables, fruit, butter, and cheese. The show of flowers is a charming sight. Here is where one can see something of the real life of Paris, and the men and women in it who do the work. Here you see them throng by the thousand to buy the necessities of life. Here you see all sorts and conditions of people. It is a study of human nature that is quite endless. You might spend days in these market places, and always find something novel. The frogs and snails were especially novel to me. The frogs look nice and dainty, and I could eat them, although it seems as if it would take a dozen to satisfy an ordinary appetite. I don't believe, however, I can eat snails yet. They do not look at all inviting. They are said to be a very delicate luxury. I am told that if I could eat an English "winkle," I ought certainly be able to go a French snail. Well, I haven't tried a "winkle" yet, and rather hesitate to do so. It is said that the daily bill of Paris for meat, wine, and bread alone amounts to 3,000,000 francs.

I cannot in this letter enumerate all the places I glance at in Paris from 7 A.M. to 12 P.M. Of course, I visit the Louvre, where there are miles and miles of paintings and miles and miles of statues. You could not walk through it in a day's travel. I also visit the Hotel de Cluny, the galleries of the Luxembourg and the gardens, the Column Vendome, the Opera House, Palace of Trocadero, Statue of the Republic, church of St. Eustache, the Place of Execution, etc. I found it impossible to visit the Catacombs, St. Germain, Fontainebleau, Versailles, and the Bourse; but I feel that I have seen enough of Paris to give a broad idea of its characteristics, its tendencies, its business and currents of life. I have seen it in my own way and I have formed my own judgment. It is said that Paris is a wicked city. It is no more wicked than London, New York, or Chicago. All that you see in Paris can be seen in those cities. Paris is a cosmopolis of luxury.

People come from all quarters of the globe to enjoy life here. They come with money. Of course Paris will give them what they want, and generally in an open manner and above board. There is, however, no more immorality in Paris than elsewhere, only there is far less hypocrisy. We see what is going on. There is no false modesty or humbug. There is more personal liberty in Paris than in any other city. The police generally mind their own business. They don't seem anxious to arrest a man or knock him down. I saw one take hold of a drunken fellow in a fatherly sort of way and urge him to go home and behave himself. In Paris they wisely let human nature alone, unless a crime is committed, and then punishment is generally sure. I saw one poor woman fighting against the policemen, refusing to be arrested, crying out in wild accents, throwing herself upon the pavement, and being dragged along. It might have been an injustice. I do not know. It was a strange and sudden eruption into the brilliancy of Paris of the dark and seething channel beneath, of which now and then we catch a momentary glimpse. This is not exceptional to Paris. It is so the world over. We know not the misery, the crime, the despair that exist. It makes the heart sick when some ghastly vision sweeps thus vividly upon the view. However, I saw only one drunken man and one drunken woman while in Paris.

A week in Paris is crowded with incident. An ever-varying panorama is before you, of which I can give only a sketch—a few flashes of the hundreds of scenes, the masses of people, the lights and shadows of the city. It is estimated that Paris has a population of over two millions, against the more than five millions of London. Here are no such billowing crowds as there. Even New York and Chicago convey an idea of more business. People don't seem to "hustle" at all in Paris, and there is no pushing, no hurrying. There is an air of equanimity about the Frenchman, as if he had reached the top and had nothing in particular to do. The everlasting go-ahead of the Anglo-Saxon race is not apparent. Your real Frenchman is after all a home-body, and there are thousands of quiet firesides in Paris. He is somewhat sedate along with his vivaciousity. Those who surge the streets, visit all the wicked places, and see the sights are generally foreigners who when at home go to church and prayer meeting; they come to Paris to have their "fling," and put the blame upon the accommodating Parisian, who shrugs his shoulders and thinks these would-be moralists rather "fresh."

I must close my account of Paris with the Eiffel Tower, a marvel of human ingenuity. We do not see its massiveness, its grace, its loftiness, until we stand beneath the mighty pillar itself. We then realize the grandeur of its construction. It is the loftiest monument in the world, attaining a height of 984 feet. It is a marvelous specimen of the accurate skill of modern science. The base covers about two and one-half acres of ground, from which rises the extraordinary and airy fabric of interlaced iron-work. Beneath the first platform is a kind of huge triumphal archway. This first platform has an area of 5860 square yards, 190 feet high; the second platform is 32 yards square and 380 feet high; the third and last platform is 904 feet from the ground, thirteen yards across, and can hold 800 people. The Lantern overhead rises 79 feet higher. One thousand seven hundred and ninety-two steps lead from base to summit.

Of course the American visitor must mount to the top of this unique tower; for certainly nowhere else is there such a view of Paris and its environs. We first ascend by elevator or "lift," to the first platform, and here we remain for awhile enchanted with the extensive prospect. The city lies before us in its varied magnificence. We then take a higher flight to the second platform. We now begin to look beyond the hills of Paris to the far country. Having drunk in this exhilarating view, with a sort of mild intoxication, almost dizziness, we might say, we begin the last and final voyage to the skies. Slowly we creep up the aerial iron pathway, while each moment unfolds a more resplendent picture. It makes the heart tremble somewhat as we climb, climb, climb, for if anything should break, there would be a fall, equal to that of Adam. It is no use to think of it. We are in the cage and must travel upward. It made me shrink to look from the Washington monument, 555 feet high, but now I am nearly a thousand feet high. We reach the topmost floor, and step forth. What a wonderful view! in some directions ninety miles, in others fifty miles away. We see all around Paris, the vast forests, the ten thousand dwellings; the great public edifices, the Louvre, the Tuileries; the cathedrals, the Pantheon; the winding river; the many bridges; the hundreds of boats. We see Montmartre, with its towering Catholic church bidding defiance to modern thought; Pere-Lachaise, with its wooded height, and beyond the luminous fields, the villages, the declivities and vales; the whole vast expanse like a bright, palpitating sea sinking into the distant horizon with mingling glories of azure and of silver. One realizes here the greatness of Paris. You seem to be taking a bird's flight over its vast extent, while with the power of a magician you pierce its thousand ways of toil and wealth. You rejoice in the genius of humanity, in the skilled hand and illuminated brain that could build this mighty monument, and pour upon the enraptured vision such riches of land and sky. It is a rare and thrilling experience to wander in this lofty pavilion; to see the empire of man, the vast world shining beneath, and above the victorious rays of his advancing science.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

The Savage Thinks He Sees Purpose in Nature.

There is one thing about teleology* that nearly everyone who has thought on the subject must have remarked. It is this—namely, that the more barbaric and ignorant the people we are concerned with, the more abundant in their view is the evidence in favor of teleology. To the savage almost everything exists as a sign or thing of import in relation to some mind. If it rains more than usual, producing a flood, there is teleology in this flood. The gods or demons did not produce it for naught. There is design, there is purpose in it. It is "realized end" for some sky-mind or cloud-thought. The wind does not develop into a hurricane for naught, the moon is not eclipsed, the lightning does not flash, two birds do not fly to the left, the entrails do not move, the man does not fall ill, the cat does not sneeze, the foot does not slip for naught. In all these there is teleology, there is design, there is purpose. They exist as realized ends for some mind or minds. The skeptic may ask how we know this. We can only reply, It must be so. Everything we ourselves produce we produce having in view some definite end or purpose. Are we to suppose that the gods are intellectually inferior to ourselves, that they are such dolts as to produce things purposelessly? So long as we believe that the known universe of stars and planets is some sort of intellectual unity (the belief of Pantheism), or some sort of system carried on essentially on the mental methods of an anthropoid ape (the belief of Theism), we must, of course, go on believing in teleology. When, however, we discover reasons for believing that the universe need not necessarily be an anthropoid ape, or under the control of an anthropoid—that there is, in fact, less reason for ascribing personality or mind to the universe than for ascribing it to a stone—we must, of course, give up teleology on the grand scale. Lange, who is hostile to Materialism, writing on teleology in his "History of Materialism," says: "All teleology has its root in the view that the builder of the universe acts in such a way that a man must, on the analogy of human reason, call his action purposeful. . . . It can now, however, be no longer doubted that nature proceeds in a way which has no similarity with human purposefulness. . . . On this point we need wait for no further proof; the facts speak so plainly, and in the most various provinces of nature so unanimously, that no view of things is henceforth admissible which contradicts these facts and their necessary meaning." Teleology is based on the crudest analogies, and is on an intellectual level with fetishism.—J. H. Beatty, in Agnostic Journal.

* TELEOLOGY—The science or doctrine of the final causes of things.—Webster.

Observations.

Piety in our public institutions is not on the universal wane, as the theocratic calamity howlers would have us believe. The capacity of one place of worship supported by this state has been doubled within the past two years. It is the chapel of the King's county penitentiary.

My respects to Monsieur Delannoy. He is the impostor extraordinary who fooled the promoters of the grotto of Lourdes until they almost came to believe that there must be something in that fake themselves. Delannoy was once a warder in a hospital, and there became convinced that less exertion was required to be a patient than to take care of one. He therefore shammed paralysis, and heroically endured the doctors' treatment for locomotor ataxia. But at last the doctors went to blistering him and hanging him up by the neck, so that life became a burden to him, and in 1889 he went to Lourdes to be healed by miracle. The game worked well. Arriving at the grotto in an apparently collapsed condition, he was carried to the gulch where the Virgin Mary is supposed to preside. Here they placed him prostrate, and he remained so for some hours. Then, as one inspired, he stood up, threw away his crutches, and walked forth singing a hymn of praise. The other pilgrims formed a procession behind him and joined in the song. Delannoy at once became famous, and for years his miraculous cure has been used for advertising purposes by the promoters of the grotto. His is the one case for which Emile Zola, in his work on Lourdes, confesses himself to be unable to account. But M. Delannoy couldn't stand prosperity, and abused his opportunities. He was a natural thief, and having a chance to steal he did so. The priests were slow to admit that their miracle of grace was a common criminal, but the secular authorities were skeptical, and the man who had fooled the doctors was exposed by a justice of the peace. Delannoy "threw a fit" when arrested, but without any good result to himself. He was "brought to" by a policeman, and upon conviction sentenced to four years' imprisonment and to police surveillance for ten years. And thus his career has ended. He had been shamming all the time. I extend my respects to Monsieur Delannoy because, although he is a colossal fraud, he has contributed his mite toward the exposure of a bigger one than himself.

The efficacy of prayer has lately undergone a crucial test in Dallas, Tex., and the residual calx is found to be wind. As related by Dr. George S. Lincoln, president of the Dallas Freethinkers' Association, the circumstances were that Mrs. S. J. Sweeney, president of the Dallas Women's Christian Temperance Association, attended a meeting of the local Freethought society, and requested the name of the speaker in order that she might pray for his conversion. The name was given her, together with that of the secretary, the conditions being, according to Dr. Lincoln's account, that if neither was converted within three months, Mrs. Sweeney should admit that there was either no God or no force in prayer. Mrs. Sweeney's version of the terms is that if neither was "touched" inside of the specified time, then she was to allow them (the speaker and the secretary) to make the denial. The difference between admitting anything and allowing another to admit it is not conspicuous, but as Mrs. Sweeney seems to think it vital, her amendment may be agreed to. The main point is that, in answer to her prayers, something was to happen inside of the three months beginning on June 4th, the date of the meeting.

This interesting incident, which attained general publicity through the newspapers, came to the notice of the Rev. Dr. Buckley, editor of the Christian Advocate, who at once put himself in epistolary communication with Mrs. Sweeney, in order to find out what she had been doing. Her reply makes him very weary, for it confirms the report as given by Dr. Lincoln, with the exception, before noted, that she never agreed to surrender her faith in God whether he paid any attention to her prayers or not. It would naturally be supposed that faith like this, in a skeptical age, must command the admiration of every believer, but Dr. Buckley fails to enthuse. While admitting that Mrs. Sweeney's moral courage may be commended, he regards the presence of Christians at Infidel meetings as of "doubtful propriety," and Mrs. Sweeney's indiscretion in being there at all is, on the whole, about as serious as the offense of appearing in bloomers. He says further that professional lecturers against Christianity are not worthy of reply. Perchance he means not susceptible of reply, but "worthy" is the euphemism he employs. "Moreover," continues the editor of the Advocate, "no positiv promise can be found in the Bible that God will convert such persons in answer to prayer. On the contrary, it is explicitly stated that there are some for whom no prayer will avail." Again, "Others are described as 'past feeling,' whom it is impossible to renew unto repentance, as having committed sins that can not be forgiven either in this world or the world to come." Let the speaker and secretary reflect on that, and then listen: "Brazen, fierce, profane opponents of all religion, as well as those who make it a subject of buffoonery, may be prayed for indeed, but they, their writings, and their speeches should be avoided as one would shun an infected district." Finally: "An excellent biblical prescription for dealing with such persons, when one finds himself unexpectedly in their presence, is this: 'Go from the presence of a foolish man, when thou perceivest not in him the lips of knowledge.' The presence of Christian people in such places invariably makes capital for the blasphemer."

If Dr. Buckley had put his closing proposition first, the rest of his objections to Mrs. Sweeney's attending the meeting of the Dallas Freethinkers would not have needed to be written. The presence of Christian persons does, of course, make capital for the Freethought lecturer. That is why they are so cordially invited to attend. If you listen to a Christian person outside a Freethought gathering, especially in a pulpit or at an experience meeting, you will have to either doubt his word or believe that he is simply in pain through his inability to meet and confound some denier of God and prayer. You know he is bluffing, but to call him is to call a policeman. When the Christian person enters a Freethought assemblage he leaves his power of arrest outside, and faces the audience on equal terms. His belief not being capable of either demonstration or convincing argument, he becomes capital, or at least raw material, for the "blasphemer." Dr. Buckley knows how worthless ordinary religious statements become the minute they are denied and proof called for. He sees with impatience that Mrs. Sweeney has taken the promises of God altogether too seriously, as though their fulfillment was to be expected, and hence the rebuke. Such a thing as her prayers being answered in this instance does not enter his head. In fact, he has a firm grasp on the truth that prayers are never answered, and ten days before the expiration of the time allotted to the test he writes in perfect confidence that God will pay no attention to Mrs. Sweeney's petition. A man of more faith might have hedged, along toward the first of September, but while any chance remained that accident could bring about the result prayed for he would not have volunteered an explanation of the failure.

An event like the conversion of Mrs. Sweeney to unbelief through the non-success of her prayers is not to be looked for. She can never have had any reason for believing in prayer, and can therefore have no less. But whether or not in this crisis she loses faith in God, it would be altogether surprising if she did not withdraw whatever confidence she may have reposed in the Rev. Dr. Buckley.

The City Vigilance League of New York is not averse to achieving its ends by the degradation of our youth. Into court last week came Frederick Schrenker, aged 16, as a witness against a saloon-keeper of whom, he alleged, he had purchased beer on Sunday. The magistrate inquired of him if he was in the habit of drinking beer in saloons, and he replied that this was the first time in his life that he had ever done so. Whereupon the magistrate addressed him in this fatherly manner: "My boy, don't do again what you did on Sunday. You might get in the habit of drinking, and that would ruin you. The society ought to be ashamed to ask boys of your age to get this evidence, and so destroy your morals. Let men get evidence against the places, and you boys keep out of them."

Such advice is sound as to the drink habit, but in this case the worst of the two evils involved was permitted to pass unprobed. The infamy of the transaction lay in the circumstances under which the beer was drank. A man once said to another, "You are a fool." "Sir," was the reply, "you are drunk." "I know I am," said the first man, "but to-morrow I shall be sober, while you will always be the same damned fool you are to-day." Exactly so with the boys employed by the City Vigilance League to get evidence against Sabbath-breakers. The effects of the beer will pass off in a headache, but the influence of a mean act is not so ephemeral. For the inebriate there abides abstinence, the temperance pledge, and the gold cure, but what can rehabilitate and clothe in self-respect the Sunday sneak?

Keir Hardie, the ex-member of the British Parliament who has come to our shores as the apostle of Socialism, is a disappointing individual. Personally, he is commonplace; intellectually, considerably less. His first break here in New York is to applaud the enforcement of the Sunday laws, and to express the hope that the assault on Sabbath-breakers at this point is but "the beginning of a fight which is to extend all over the country." Proceeding in the same line, Mr. Hardie says that Socialism is Christianity, and that he has the same faith in it as a system of economics that he reposes in it as a way of salvation. In addition to being sentimentally pious, the Socialist ex-member of Parliament is inordinately vain. Nordau would call him an egomaniac. Exhibiting his miner's cap to an audience, he related that this same piece of headgear had created consternation in the House of Commons, the members pretending, says he, that they objected to the cap; but, he adds, sententiously, "It was not the cap they were afraid of, but the head inside of it." Of such timber is Mr. Keir Hardie, apostle of Socialism and Jesus Christ. One advantage enjoyed by these fellows who are so stuck on themselves is that they are not troubled with rivals.

I wouldn't say it myself, nor would I believe it on the word of a male citizen, but when Mrs. M. Florence Johnson, a daughter of Moses Hull and a contributor to Lucifer, the organ of sex emancipation, asserts, unrebuked by the editor, that woman is enslaved because she prefers the comparative ease of chains to the hard work necessary to industrial independence, there can be no offense in repeating the remark—more especially as it appears to be true. The thought has often occurred to this deponent that if there were no statute law whatever to govern in the matter, the relations of men and women would be substantially what they are now. That is, the woman would do the housework and the man would take the responsibility of grub-staking the outfit. The question of "sphere" has nothing to do with it—it is the line of least resistance for both parties. Eliminating that species of insanity designated as "love," which is but another form of avarice, and allowing for the dissolution of the partnership at the instance of one or both parties, I conceive that the arrangement is as near perfect as any that could be entered into by fools.

Adherents of the Prohibition party, after the manner of an evil and adulterous generation, are looking for a sign. They want a party emblem to put at the head of their ticket. Some would choose a lamb, as a symbol of the innocence and purity of the Rev. Dr. Funk, while others suggest a picture of Niagara Falls, typifying the eloquence of the Hon. John G. Woolley of Chicago. These, though beautiful, are basically inadequate. It would require a policeman with drawn club and a Prohibition office-holder with drawn salary to represent all there really is in the movement.

GEO. E. MACDONALD.

Jeremiah Hacker.

All Freethinkers in the United States have heard of Jeremiah Hacker, the veteran fighter of shams. To very many his name has long been a household word. Four decades and more ago he was publishing the Pleasure Boat at Portland, Maine. It found its way into all parts of the country where there were progressivemen and women, and it did an immense amount of good pioneer work. It exposed the contradictions and barbarities of the Bible in a trenchant, homely way that could not fail to leave a lasting impression on the mind of the thinking reader, and he traveled and lectured in the same cause seventy years ago. In a letter to S. P. Putnam, which appears in "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," he tersely tells his life story:

Seventy years ago I commenced lecturing against priestcraft. I traveled thousands of miles and delivered hundreds of lectures. I never took a fee at the door, nor permitted a contribution box to be passed, nor said anything about money. The people were in such a condition then that if I had asked for pay they would have said that the dollar was all that I was after. I had to force them into the belief that I was working for their welfare, and wanted to free them from the bondage of the churches. In 1845 I met James Arrington Clay in Gardiner, Maine. He was the first outspoken Infidel I became acquainted with. He published a large book and circulated it free. He gave me five or more, for which I pledged my overcoat. I started a Liberal paper, the Pleasure Boat, and, with a small beginning, I ran the paper for sixteen years, and sent it at least one year to every man, woman, or child that asked for it, whether they paid for it or not. I had subscribers among the most enlightened class in every state in the Union. At that time Maine had vast quantities of land which it was selling to Shylocks in large tracts. Through my paper, and appeals to the governor and legislature, I got a law to give every landless man in Maine, and who would settle on it, one hundred and sixty acres of land for fifty cents an acre, and this to be paid in labor—making roads, etc. Then I saw scores of farmers, each with a two-horse wagon, covered with cloth, containing their beds, dishes, tools, wives and children—all they had in the world—steering for the wilderness. I also got a reform school established for juvenile offenders, at Westbrook, near Portland.

Mr. Hacker has resided at Vineland, N. J., for a number of years, and has kept up his warfare with the legions of ignorance and superstition, in verse and prose ridiculing and arguing against the doctrine of biblical inspiration, and attacking the popular follies and wrongs of his time. Six years ago his companion, whom, in the old Pleasure Boat, he always tenderly and respectfully spoke of as his "Mate," was laid to rest at Vineland. And now he reposes beside her. For Jeremiah Hacker is dead—dead in the fulness of years and of services. His card from H. G. Hancock, who cared for him in the closing days of his life, tells how he died:

That noblest of all our band of Freethinkers, Jeremiah Hacker, died at 5.30 o'clock this morning, August 30th, and never before in my life have I witnessed so quiet, peaceful, and painless a death. He had no disease, but grew weaker day by day and the candle burned out before he reached the hoped-for century milestone. Last May he was ninety-four.

The New York Herald of September 1st has this account of the man who was an Infidel to the end:

VINELAND, N. J., Aug. 31, 1895.—The funeral this afternoon of Jeremiah Hacker, a poet and author, who died on Thursday, at the age of ninety-four, was held without rites or ceremonies of any kind, and the body was conveyed to the graveyard in an ordinary wagon.

He was born at Brunswick, Me., in 1802, and received only a common school education. When yet a very young man he began teaching school for a living. His attacks upon the Bible, however, soon gained him wide notoriety, and he became editor of the Pleasure Boat, published at Portland, Me. The paper had an extensive circulation, but when on the eve of the rebellion he advocated peace the circulation of the paper quickly melted away.

He then came to Vineland, where his attacks upon the church again put him before the public. He composed poems ridiculing the Bible, and, followed by men and boys, walked through the principal streets of the town singing his poems and preaching to the crowds. An announcement in the daily papers that he would appear in the public square always attracted a crowd. Mr. Hacker was firm in his belief that he was doing good, and his large fortune was spent in inculcating his ideas. He was liberal to the poor.

When his wife died, six years ago, Mr. Hacker erected two tombstones on his lot at Siloam cemetery. On his wife's was inscribed, underneath the usual legend the question, "Where is God?" On his own tombstone was carved the following: "The Angry, Wrathful Bible God is a Myth."

These tombstones, so close to monuments piously inscribed, caused much comment, and many persons visited the graveyard to see "those awful tombstones." Lot owners appealed to the trustees to have the offensive slabs removed, but the trustees became divided over the question, and the tombstones are still standing.

Mr. Hacker was a member of the "Ten Dollar Coffin Society," of this place, the rules of which will not allow any member to be buried at an expense exceeding $10. His last words were a request to be buried in a cheap box, and without a hearse. The latter part of the request was carried out, but to the first part his friends would not consent. Mr. Hacker's death was calm.

We do not know how large a fortune Mr. Hacker had earlier in life nor after the time of the incident he mentions in the quotation we have made from his letter to Mr. Putnam, where he speaks of leaving his overcoat as security for a few books; but it is certain that recently he has been very poor, so poor that it was feared he would be thrown on the charity of the outside world, and to prevent this the Freethinkers of the country contributed money for his assistance.

Jeremiah Hacker seems almost to have belonged to another century. He was more than double the age of the oldest man in THE TRUTH SEEKER office, with the exception of one compositor, and the sprightliest of us can only faintly hope that we can retain to the end of life the clearness and vigor of intellect that were his to the last. He was loyal to the truth as he saw it; he was an honest worker, a fearless speaker, a generous helper, and in death he signed no treaty of peace with superstition, hypocrisy, and despotism. At his graveside we uncover in sincere respect for a true man, and pledge ourselves anew to battle unceasingly against the Christian church and all that it represents of devotion to darkness and treason to human liberty.

The Old, Old Problem.

In a recent number of THE TRUTH SEEKER, under "News and Notes," Mr. S. P. Putnam says: "Of course, true philosophy, as well as true science, will result in Atheism and Materialism. There can be no other conclusion. It must be conceded that material phenomena are the antecedent of mental phenomena, and while material phenomena are everywhere in time and space as we experience it, mental phenomena occupy but a very small portion of universal existence. So far as we know, such phenomena are only on this planet."

Is Mr. Putnam justified in the assertion that mental phenomena are only on this planet? Does he not know that animal life and intelligence are co-existent, be the plane ever so low? That as one improves the other also improves, and that when a planet is sufficiently developed for life to manifest itself it is ready to make that manifestation, let that be where it may? Our planet is no better than others equally well-developed, and there are celestial orbs far in advance of ours.

Every force of nature is equally applicable to every celestial orb in existence, so soon as it is sufficiently developed to receive that force, whether it be applicable to only inorganic or also to organic existence; therefore that assumption must be a mistake.

The force or principle we call spirit is always ready to combine with matter as soon as the planet is ready to receive it, and the result is life and mind, or intelligence. Now the question arises, Is matter the ruler of this spirit force, or is it the reverse? Is spirit force older than matter, or the reverse? I will venture the assertion that they are co-existent, and also co-existent with all other forces in nature's process of development, which is evolution; therefore I deny that material phenomena are antecedent to mental phenomena. Matter may be so attenuated or disintegrated that the influence of gravitation is not perceptible, but gravitation is ready to assert its power of attraction so soon as this matter is sufficiently consolidated to feel its force. This, however, is not evidence that matter is antecedent to the attraction of gravitation. I perceive that Materialism has grown out of antagonism to past religions, or rather, superstitions, and I want to search for the truth rather than antagonism.

Much in the article quoted from is true, and in harmony with the cosmic philosophy, which I believe to be true philosophy. I make another quotation: "Clearing away these stumbling-blocks, we have simply material and mental phenomena, known only by sensation and reflection, but really known as they are."

This passage requires some definite line to divide material from mental; we would like to know where one ends and the other begins. Is space a material property? Is matter material? Is time material? Are the forces or attractions, such as attraction of gravitation or cohesion, or electrical attraction or chemical attraction, material or mental? Are they known only by sensation and reflection, but known as they really are?

I will give you my opinion on this subject: Space is inappreciable to man, except when represented by the existence of matter, a substance that can be known to man only through his external senses. Time is a definite portion of eternity, the unit of which is measured to us on the planet earth by its revolution on its axis, producing light and darkness through the presence or absence of the sun's rays, one revolution being called a day, which is by man divided into hours, minutes, and seconds; or, when added together, are called months, years, or other measures of time.

The forces of nature are not perceptible to our senses, excepting through their application. Gravitation holds worlds together, and is manifested in the dewdrop or in the ocean's depths. Cohesion is manifested to our senses through the mountains, rocks, trees, metals, etc.; and of the other forces, each is known through its effects on nature, and only through its effects. I am not prepared to divide these properties into material and mental, although part are certainly material in character. Do any of these properties possess within themselves intelligence? Yet life certainly manifests intelligence, which is derived from a union of spirit force with matter, although spirit force may not of itself possess intelligence, and matter inherently certainly does not. Nevertheless, the union can produce this effect, on the principle that chemistry may mix two inert properties and the combination become a terrible explosiv.

The development of each and every planet had a beginning; life on each planet had a beginning, but the primary elements in nature are as eternal as a God could possibly be. Space without matter, and matter without gravitation or cohesion, or any other of nature's forces, is an absurdity. Each of these primary properties must of necessity be inherent in nature, ready for duty when conditions will permit. Growth or development is nature's method; it never goes backward, but advances with time. The leaves may fall, but the germ or tree puts forth a new growth.

There are casualties or conflicts occurring in the operations of nature's forces, such as storms, floods, fires, earthquakes, and various other phenomena that are destructive to human life. The earthquake is the result of causes and effects that relate to the formation or development of the earth itself, but has no consciousness of the existence of man, therefore it might swallow a city without the consciousness of its existence. This line of argument will apply to all the other forces in nature that are not controlled by intelligence. They are effects subject to causes which are forces in nature not controlled by intelligence, and which are not responsible for what man suffers through their agency. There is no god in the case to save man or cause him to suffer, but mere casualties or conflicts in the processes of nature.

I alluded to the spirit force that coalesces with matter and produces life. This life is not a creation, but the effect of an existing cause as certainly as the hardened rock is the effect of the attraction of cohesion. Man passes the germinal period, the pre-natal, and the mundane, and retains his identity, and in each transition his identity is intensified. The germ cannot be said to contain life, although the germ of life is there. The pre-natal is life in a very feeble state, but capable of growth, and after birth, although quite feeble, the powers of individuality are greatly increased, and growth or development is accelerated both physically and mentally. But after a time the physical attains maturity, and then the powers are directed to the development of the mental, which increases during mundane existence.

Is it reasonable that this continuous chain of progression should be snapped off in oblivion? [Is not the same true of the tree, the infusoria, the dog, the plant—are they not all immortal?] Reason says cause must produce its effect, that one step taken compels another as the effect of an existing cause. Facts corroborate the reasoning, and philosophy sustains the evidence of a continuous higher existence.

What have been mentioned are primary conditions, and we have only to cross the threshold to a higher school of development, of which spirit communion gives ample evidence, and this later transition will be followed by others, we have good reason to know.

Refusing or neglecting to investigate these facts is to be compared to the child that fails to learn the alphabet, which is a complete barrier to the acquisition of further lessons until it is mastered. There are other lessons ready for the pupil's acceptance as fast as he can receive them. So it is with future life—you cannot find the last lesson.

MR. EDITOR: I see I am far behind with you in my pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER, something that is not common with me, and all the excuse that I will now give is that my health is so poor and my life seems to be almost run out. I am in my eighty-fourth year, and I have thought it was about time to go, and so I have let my account run, to be settled at the end of my journey through life. But as I still live, I concluded that I would send you the needful for another year, and I will have it passed on, after I have the reading of it, to others. The faithful old TRUTH SEEKER I have always stood by and defended as the noblest representative of the true American principles that we have to-day, although I don't wish to be understood as intending to slight other noble Freethought prints.

Yours as ever for the truth and the right,

Christian Missionaries in China.

LOS ANGELES, CAL., Aug. 18, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: There are many regrets expressed and much sympathy bestowed on Christian missionaries in China, when the natives rise up and massacre a few and tear down their dwelling-houses; but, thus far,

I have never felt the presence of a regret or been conscious of any sympathetic feeling; for missionaries who force themselves into a country where they are not wanted, and attempt to introduce a fighting religion that has deluged the world in blood, deserve all they get, and more too. It is an insult to the great Chinese nation to have a lot of Christian fanatics go there and tell the people they are on the road to hell because of a false religion, and they must worship the god-phantom in Christian style or be forever damned. Yet this is just what they do, for before they can establish the doctrines of Christianity they must destroy a belief in the more ancient and more peaceable religion of Confucius. It has always seemed to me that it was time enough for Christians to go there with their system of foolish absurdities when they are invited, but modesty and a proper regard for the rules of good manners are never manifested by the followers of Jesus in their insane anxiety to convert the world. They are going there any way, and ram their creeds down the throats of people who are their superiors, from a religious standpoint if no other, for the Chinaman's religion is nowhere revealed by a trail of blood, and never, for the glory of God, have they tortured and killed to extend it. It is true their religion, like all others, is largely destitute of common sense, but its peaceable character elevates it far above Christianity. While it gives satisfaction to those who accept it, and no desire exists for a change, no good reason can be given for trying to displace it with one many times worse. So, when I see the efforts made by foolish fanatics to convert that great nation by introducing the most damnable religion ever generated in the minds of the priesthood, the opposition they encounter is seen with hearty approval; for, though opposed to bloodshed and violence, it seems necessary in such cases to compel Christians to mind their own business. Christians believe in a God endowed with omnipotence and the possession of such an attribute insures the establishment of any religion he desires; so, if God wants Chinamen to be Christians, he can make them so at once; and I am in favor of leaving that work of conversion right where it belongs—in the hands of omnipotent God. There is a building in this city, erected and owned by the Women's Christian Temperance Union, and the corner-stone has this inscription: "The battle is God's, not yours," and every time it is read I inwardly remark: "Then let him fight it." And the same feeling prevails in regard to the establishment of Christianity, both here and in China; for, if God wants the entire world to accept it, one little miracle will do the business, and miracles, we all know, used to be his specialty.

If Christians will persist in the absurd attempt of converting three or four hundred million Chinamen, who dislike and detest them, then let them reap the consequences, without calling for war-ships and soldiers to protect them. If they will mind their own business they will need neither, but if they won't, then, for one, I hope the Chinese will compel them to, and kick every Christian fanatic out of the country who persists in staying where he knows he isn't wanted. Let the good work go on, and may China soon be rid of the numerous and inharmonious sects that love Jesus and hate each other.

"What One Can Do."

VERA CRUZ, MO., July 13, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: When I moved to this locality about six years ago, I found the blight of superstitious cant in almost complete control of the ignorant and unthinking parts of the country. At the revival meetings the pious sponges would picture a hell, or place of torture, that was always in waiting for those who chose to give their best food to their children at home instead of to the parson, or would not come under the wings of sanctimony and be fleeced of one-tenth of their earnings. But, alas! at an unexpected time, while one of their holy leaders of the Baptist persuasion (who had tramped into the country in the early spring of 1891 without money or scrip in his pockets, and whom rumor accused of being a fugitive from justice) was pouring hot shot on to the heads of some whom his pious supporters had suspected of keeping their children away from the mourners' bench, he threw his lasso of wrath a little too far and very ferociously looped it around the horns of old "Infidel Davis." This created a tumult in their camp, and when all the pious snobs of pretension grabbed the rope and tried to haul in their victim and found the old Infidel immovable, they were dumfounded, and, in the spleen and venom of their natural Christian hearts, they poured on him all the vituperation and misrepresentation they were able to command. This set the machinery of reform at work in earnest, and although I had kept almost silent on the subject since coming to this country up to that time, I told them my mouth was open from thence on and that I was going to down them if it took me the rest of my life to do it. I commenced to put it to them without reserve in both private and public, and in connection with their misrepresentation, abuse, and ostracism they even threatened to mob me out of the country, but all to no avail. I have beaten them on every hand. I now have several good and able helpers, and we are coming out ahead; we have almost outlived it all. Some of my most earnest opponents at that time are now among my best friends. The people have gotten their eyes open to such an extent that the sky-pilots of the country can scarcely get a corporal's guard in numbers for hearers; their Lord has deserted them; their god-houses are rotting down; their holy Bible is riddled, and now, at the point nearing the close of the scene, two of the self-same Baptist pulp-pounders who lit on me the hardest five years ago, are quarreling about Bible translations. One of them has got one scale off his eyes to such an extent that he says he can see that the Bible has not all been correctly translated, and he can prove it. This makes the other parson wrathful, and verily the good work goes on. One after another of "gawds'" holy men have been brought to this country to get up another revival, but no good, no good—the one of five years ago is the last, and holy humbug has been compelled to take a back seat. I now have an agreement with a preacher that I will read one of his pamphlets if he will read your "Design Argument Fallacies," which I wish you to send me. Inclosed find stamps for same.

Yours for truth, S. B. DAVIS.

What One Sample Copy Did.

ELY, IA., Aug. 19, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I have read the Letters of Friends with pleasure, and often thought I would write.

I never gave very much attention to Freethought until after hearing R. G. Ingersoll lecture on the Bible at Green's Opera House at Cedar Rapids last winter, and reading the sample copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER which you sent Mr. J. C. Dvorak. I now read all the Freethought literature that I can borrow, and when I can spare a few cents, buy a book. The "Age of Reason" I got of you I have not read yet, but lent it to Mr. Dvorak; and when he got through and was about to return it, a traveling agent came in and, taking out his catalog of goods, was ready for Mr. Dvorak's order. Mr. Dvorak told him that he had a catalog that would beat the agent's catalog out of sight, and handed him the "Age of Reason." The agent looked at it and told Mr. Dvorak that he had been looking for that book in the book stores and could not find one. He asked Mr. Dvorak if he would lend it to him, promising to return it in good order. Mr. Dvorak thought I would not object; so lent him the book. I am glad that Mr. Dvorak lent the book, and if he can do so again, I hope he will; and yet that duffer in Washington, D. C., has gall enough to say that the "Age of Reason" is out of date and belongs among the ancient and dusty literature. How can there be great sales of it when book-stores will not keep it for sale?

Both of my parents were baptized and brought up under the dark shadows of the cross, but after going among the people to earn their daily bread they found that Christianity is nothing but humbug. So they stopped putting their hard-earned money into the coffers of the priests.

While my father was among the living he was a subscriber to a Bohemian paper, called Dennice Novoveku (The Morning Star of the New Age), published yet at Cincinnati, Ohio, by V. Snajdr. It is not entirely a Freethought paper, being also political, story, and news. Very often it contains articles on Bible absurdities, the pranks the priests and preachers are up to, etc. It also prints selections from the great writers upon Freethought.

August 14th was a great day for the Freethinkers of Ely. That day we had the pleasure of meeting J. E. Remsburg and hearing him lecture on the "Demands of Liberalism." The day dawned bright and warm, but towards noon the sky began to be cast over with clouds, and between 2 and 3 o'clock it began to rain and rained for about half an hour. It was a bad outlook for our lecture. But (as the Christians say, "Thank God from whom all blessings flow") about 5 o'clock the clouds began to sail away, and we saw the sun set in all its brightness, thus giving us a cool and beautiful evening. Another prayer of the Christians was unanswered, as I have no doubt that a great many prayed for a big down-pour of water, not so much on account of the drouth as to spoil the meeting. I should judge the attendance besides the children was between fifty and seventy-five. There were a few Christians in the audience. We thank them for their kindness in attending the lecture. We expected there would be more, but I suppose they thought it would be a sin to attend and eternal damnation to hear such a lecture. I have been told the few Christians that did attend speak very favorably of Mr. Remsburg and his address.

I hope friend Peck will write soon one of his humorous, entertaining, and instructive letters. I hope it will be a long one.

Yours, JOHN B. WIDRA.

When Those Laws are Fundamentally Just.

SPRINGFIELD, ILL., Aug. 17, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Your "Freethinkers' Pictorial Text-Book" received. On the whole, it is a magnificent portrayal of the vast amount of perverse thought that exists in the world to-day, as reflected in the actions of creed believers. It is not unlike a panoramic illustration of the great and varied suffering entailed upon humanity by the cruel efforts of one portion trying to overcome an inexorable law of nature by resorting to every sort and kind of fraud, deceit, treachery, and even punishment, that the ingenuity of the meanest brain can devise. However, we, as Liberal thinkers, must be Liberal. Some of Mr. Heston's illustrations are radical—are overdrawn. And I resent all reflections on "Uncle Sam." His (Heston's) illustrations representing "Uncle Sam" in alliance with the church are severe and unjust. I don't see how any Liberal thinker can draw an illustration reflecting on our form of government, although it is not perfect by any means. It is not what Liberal thinkers would like to see. But it is such a vast step in the right direction, and so much better than any other form of government that ever existed among men, I think its highest praises should be sounded. Don't deride "Uncle Sam," for he is "a daisy" for the chance he has had. Let's stand shoulder to shoulder and make the government better—the foundation is splendid.

I am probably different from any Freethinker extant. At least I feel that I stand alone, so far as I have ever known. I am one of those who believe that every other individual creature upon this insignificant mundane sphere of ours has a perfect right to think as he pleases, and even act as he pleases, so long as he does not invade the civil rights of any other person. Furthermore, he must act within the pale of the system of civil laws adopted for his government, and when those laws fail to meet the wishes of a majority of the people, change them by quiet and peaceful exercise of the ballot. I believe Mr. Heston has overdrawn some of his illustrations, but he has a right to think as he does. I have an equal right to think differently, but must not do so to his detriment. I may convince him that he is wrong, if I can, but must not undertake to do so by any force that will invade his civil rights to "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." Also, I think that in all the dark ages, and all other ages, men had a full and perfect right to think and believe as they chose, so long as they were honest in it and did not try to invade the inalienable rights of others. Nero had a right to think that the early Christians were wrong and should be suppressed, but Nero himself was wrong when he killed Christians simply for their belief. He thereby invaded their rights. Calvin had a right to differ from Servetus in thought, but old Calvin was in the wrong when he dragged Servetus to the stake. The pope had a right to believe that Luther was wrong in his belief, but the pope should have stopped at that. The dignitaries of the Church of England had a right to think that all Catholics were wrong in their belief and ceremonies of religion, but there they should have stopped. We do not fully control our thought-producing machinery, hence we should not lose any civil rights for expression of honest thought.

Very respectfully, H. CLAY WILSON.

["Uncle Sam," and his nephews, the states, not Mr. Heston, are responsible for the present governmental alliance with the church. When he and they stop exempting church property from equal taxation with the homes of the people; when he and they stop enacting and enforcing church laws regarding the use of Sunday; when he and they stop teaching religion in the Indian and common schools; when he stops muzzling the mails and recognizing church holy days by proclamation; when he stops closing World's Fairs on Sunday at the behest of the church—when he and they dissolve their alliance with the Christian church, Watson Heston will stop calling attention to that alliance. Freethought stands for truth, and it is the truth that there is an alliance, every day growing closer, between the Christian church and "Uncle Sam."

As to Mr. Wilson's affirmation of the right of universal mental liberty, and his denial of the alleged right to invade, we do not know what he means when he says that he supposes that he stands alone in this regard, that he is probably different from any other Freethinker living. Of course all Freethinkers make that affirmation and that denial. That means simply the right of private judgment, which is the bottom principle of Freethought. If Mr. Wilson stands on this platform he has every Freethinker in the world with him.—ED. T. S.]

Cremation.

FISHKILL-ON-HUDSON, N. Y.,
Aug. 25, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I have been to the Crematory and Columbarium at Fresh Pond, Queens county, N. Y., and am so delighted with all I saw there.

Cremation is a perfect success. All the world needs to convince it of the beauty and feasibility of this way of disposing of its dead is to make a visit to the place and read a few copies of the Urn.

The Columbarium is a building without its equal in this country. It was finished within one year, and in a time of unprecedented business depression, and bonds sold at par when other values shrunk fifty per cent! Everything speaks of the coming age when burying the dead in the ground will be thought barbarous and old foggyish.

Some may imagine it a terrible thing to have a dear friend cremated, but should they once see the process, all such feelings would pass away. Everything is decorous and orderly. The services are held in a large, handsome room, which has already two lovely memorial windows.

There are niches all around the walls, where beautiful urns of glass and other material are set. These hold the ashes of the dead. They are wreathed with flowers and green vines, and ornamented with ribbons; name, age, etc., inscribed thereon. All is bright, gay, and seriously cheerful.

The dead body is taken from the coffin and wrapped in a sheet dipped in alum-water, so that when it is moved into the oven it does not offend the sight by any show of flames. The door is closed upon it, and that is the last till the ashes only remain. Even the coffin is broken up and burned so friends will be sure it will be made no further use of.

The body is not cremated in the coffin, because the materials of it would take fire at once. Everything is done with a kindly regard for the feelings of the spectators. No clouds falling upon the coffin. No thought of gradual decay and creeping worms and possible return to life only to die ten thousand deaths in the narrow prison.

We entered our names in the big book as visitors. Mr. Parkhurst and wife (who took me there) are among the largest shareholders in the Crematory, and expect to be cremated when they die, as I myself would be if I lived near.

The average cost is $35 for adults and $25 for children, while the average cost of burial, outside of the money spent for lots and monuments, is $150.

There will be no terror of grave robbery, which is now so frequent.

No contagious diseases from drinking water coming through cemeteries. No waste of valuable lands in or near our great cities, devoted to burial places.

No digging up and removal of our dead by laws that sell us burial lots and yet give us no right to hold them indefinitely.

"Even in Glasgow to-day, how are the poor buried? Visit Belvedere and you will see great square holes, ten and twelve feet wide and about the same depth. These holes will be packed with the dead as so many fish might be packed in a box, and then three feet of dirt covers the top!" All this within touch of the city and the city's water supply.

Bodies from twenty-three different countries had been cremated at Fresh Pond Crematory up to April, 1895, Germany furnishing the greatest number (746).

The sanitary reasons for cremation are such as appeal forcibly to most intelligent people. At present, while there are, no doubt, many who would not consent to cremation for themselves or for their families, there are but few who do not consider it an admirable act, even a necessary procedure, in the case of some parts of the community. Our cities are growing so tremendously fast, presenting problems such as no other generation has ever had to meet, that the question of the disposal of the dead becomes a very serious and perplexing problem indeed. And the old-fashioned graveyard does not meet it.

Between burial and burning there is no difference in the final result. The difference is in the process. The inevitable change is wrought, in the one case slowly, in the other quickly; in one by the action of clean flame, in the other by the action of damp earth.

I assume, then, that the present way of disposing of our dead is not conducive to health, and that a better state of things would be ours if cremation instead of burial, were adopted. This will have its enemies from different quarters. But one of the greatest hindrances the advocates of cremation will meet will come from the church, because of its established forms of religion and its theological conception of man's future condition. The church has in every instance opposed science in her onward march to give light and life to man.

There is said to be "no firmer friend than fire." It burns up all waste, contagion, and offensive material. It is the concentrated essence of the glorious sunshine.

Let us, then, all be fire worshipers, purity seekers, and cleanliness creators.

'Tis wisdom's way, and hence Of all man's methods since the world began Doth best become the cultured state of man.

Then, prejudice away, none need to turn From the clean ashes in yon sacred urn, The innoxious fruit of fire's refining art, And lone chaste remnant of life's human part.

ELMIRA SLEEKER.

The Cause in Oregon.

PORTLAND, OR., Aug. 20, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Despite the intensity and immensity of caloric, rendering the city like a bake shop of Tophet with the lid on, the First Secular Church of Portland has held her own. The Sunday evening lectures and the Secular Sunday-school have continued without intermission or vacation; interest has increased, attendance has been excellent, constant additions being made both to Sunday-school and church. Last Sunday three new members signed the membership roll, declaring they would do all in their power to advance the aims and objects of the church, and pay monthly in advance the sum promised as dues. It is impossible to sustain an organization without means. The simply signing blanks amounts to ———, nothing more. The fact is, "where your treasure is there will your heart be also" is just as true to-day as when repeated (borrowed from the pagans) by the Galilean pessimist.

The church gave its pastor, Miss Olds, three weeks' vacation, and it tested the ability and devotion of the other workers to sustain the interest in her absence. C. B. Reynolds filled her place as lecturer, while the Sunday-school work and entertainments were most creditably conducted under the management of those trustworthy assistants, Mrs. Clara Bailey and the Sunday-school superintendent, Miss Ada Dawey. Miss Olds repaired to Long Beach, in search of rest and much-needed strength for the coming fall and winter campaign, but, in response to the very kind and urgent invitation of the Secular church of Silverton, abridged her holiday to comply with their solicitations.

Silverton has always been the banner town of Liberalism in this state. Never once have they allowed the banner to trail in defeat or disuse, and there is no liability of Silverton ever failing to maintain its proud and well-earned pre-eminence, for all the leading farmers and merchants are Liberals—Liberals in very deed as well as profession. Miss Nettie A. Olds scored a grand triumph at Silverton. The following extract from a most reliable correspondent will be read with interest:

Miss Olds lectured at our Universal Mental Liberty Hall, Saturday evening, August 10th. Her subject was "Salvation—the Real and the Ideal." The harvest was at its height, with the church and Sunday-school adjourned for the summer, and many away to the coast and mountains, yet the interest to see and hear the much-talked-of youngest one of the most devoted workers and able exponents of our principles, resulted in an attendance of 150. Miss Olds won the hearts of our people here. Our bright, brainy young president, Pearl W. Gser, made a few very appropriate remarks at the close of the lecture, and commented upon the rapt attention that had been paid the speaker, due to her charming delivery of new, bright thoughts and her logical reasoning. Her words came from her heart, and touched the hearts of all her hearers. Miss Olds was the guest of Mr. and Mrs. J. Hammond, whose happy home is a daily living illustration of the harmony, peace, and joy that result from the practice of the principles of Liberalism.

On Sunday evening our own Silverton brass band rendered a number of exhilarating pieces—it was really an admirable concert—and called the audience together. There were fully one-third more present than on Saturday evening. The lecture was preceded by overtures by the Silverton Secular Church orchestra. Miss Olds recited "Nameless," with a pathos and feeling that proved her an able elocutionist. Our own accomplished secretary, Miss Myrtle Buff, an able elocutionist, charmed the audience with a masterly recitation. Then Miss Olds delivered the lecture, "The Flag Above the Cross." The enthusiasm was tremendous, and the long-continued applause testified appreciation of the truths and sentiments uttered.

Some one told of Miss Olds' ability as a violinist, and a general demand was made on her to play. She consented, to gratify the old folks, saying that her knowledge of music forbade her to play for the young folks of Silverton, who themselves possessed so much of culture and natural musical talent. So she played "Opera Reel" and "Soldier's Joy," to the delight of the baldheads and graybeards, who could scarcely be restrained from "shaking their hoofs." The young folks are eager for the return of Miss Olds.

Thanks to Charles Hagner, the most indomitable worker, whom nothing can discourage, the Secular Sunday-school at Vancouver has become an established success. This has not been brought about without persistent effort; but from a little few and a listless, almost hopeless despondency, because of difficulties and indifference, by his zeal and heroic enthusiasm and persistence, he has now the satisfaction of having awakened a real interest, not alone on the part of the children, but of the adults, and has over twenty children, earnest students of natural philosophy, and a calisthenic class and enthusiastic little army in the flag drill. The parents of the children appreciate the practical lessons taught by the Secular Sunday-school Lesson Leaves, and the Gems of Thought tersely and pleasingly making indelible impressions on the young minds, alike of everyday facts of science and simple moral truths.

The outlook for the Seventh Annual Convention of the Oregon State Secular Union is most encouraging. The proposition to devote the morning and afternoon sessions to practical business and the completion of plans to more successfully carry on our work receives many commendations. The Co-operative Benevolent Insurance Secret Society is heartily indorsed by every one who has written me on the subject.

The Portland Industrial Exposition is now an assured fact, so that friends from all sections can have the advantage of the reduced rates. The board of directors are especially anxious to have a goodly delegation of Washington Liberals present at the Convention. They are most cordially invited and urged to be present, and are assured of a most hospitable and hearty reception. (Please notify me as soon as possible of your coming, so that satisfactory arrangements can be made, and all insured desirable homes during their sojourn.)

The business meetings, day time, will be held at Labor Council Hall; the public meetings, lectures, and entertainment, Friday evening at Turn Hall. Saturday evening, grand dramatic performance; interesting drama, "Ireland As It Was," followed by the glorious, laughter-provoking farce, "Sarah's Young Man." Exhibition of the Sunday-school work, Sunday morning, 10 A.M. Convention will close with a grand ball at Labor Hall, Sunday evening.

Our expenses are heavy, and any true Liberals who, without doing injustice to any one who has prior claims, can remit financial help, will receive the gratitude of the committee of arrangements; and the remembrance of their having helped to make others happy by relieving them of anxiety and administering to the general advancement of the cause and the success of the Convention, will afford them sweet source of meditation and rejoicing in the future.

Mortuary—Ellen Hutchison Burt.

ARMSTRONG, IA., Aug. 18, A.M. 295.

MR. EDITOR: I wish to let the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER know that my mother, one of its old-time readers and an admirer of its founder, died August 7th. Her maiden name was Ellen Hutchison. She was born in Fifeshire, Scotland, and came to this country in 1852. She was born and raised in the Presbyterian faith, but after the writer subscribed for THE TRUTH SEEKER, and she read its outspoken pages, she turned her back on all class opinions, and longed for the complete emancipation of the mind of man from the thralldom of religious fear. She was very outspoken, making herself enemies sometimes thereby, but she would say, "I dinna care a curse for folk that dinna care for me," meaning, of course, for their opinions, as she always was free with them as before. She was seventy-three years old, and was buried without the aid of the church, according to her wishes; for she had said that if her family disregarded her last wishes by having a preacher talk over her remains, and it were possible, she would kick the end out of the coffin. One of our neighbors, a Mr. Ogilvie, read Form No. 2 of THE TRUTH SEEKER Collection, and parts of several other forms. Two of her daughters failed to attend the funeral simply because there was no preacher, and those of us who are Freethinkers were not giving her a Christian burial. However, there were many of the old neighbors in attendance, and some of them spoke well of the ceremony afterwards, and the preachers of this community got a chance to see that we could die without them as well as live without them. Mother leaves a family of eight to mourn her loss, four of whom are Agnostics. Also a husband who is an admirer of Ingersoll and John Peck. Mother was also an admirer of Heston, and one of her legacies to me was the "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book," on the flyleaf of which I have written

Remember 'tis no idle toy,
A mother's gift—remember, boy.

Yours, PETER H. BURT.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

When I Am Gone.

Will grieving friends, when I am cold,
Beside my narrow bedside stand,
And softly kiss the withered hand,
And speak the name I bore of old,
When I am cold?

Will loving feet, when I am dead,
At fond affection's bidding come,
And follow to its silent home
My lifeless form, with gentle tread,
When I am dead?

Will tender hands, when I am gone,
Caress the form so silent now,
And softly touch the marble brow,
And deck with flowers the simple stone,
When I am gone?

When life is o'er, and I am dead,
Will loving eyes their brightness dim
With tender tears at thought of him
Who lies so still upon his bed—
When I am dead?

Will kindly lips, when life has flown,
Recall the dear and olden days,
And cover all my faults with praise,
And tell the good I did, alone,
When life has flown?

O friends of mine, while I am here
Imprint your kiss upon my brow;
I need your true affection now;
Oh, let me feel your presence near,
While I am here.

Let loving feet, while shines the day,
Keep faithful march beside my own,
Nor let me go my way alone;
Attend me as I tread the way
While shines the day.

And let me feel the willing clasp
Of helping hands to cheer and aid;
Of what avail, when I am dead,
Their tender touch and lingering grasp—
Their thrilling clasp?

And cheer me with your gentle light,
And with your fond affection beam,
O loving eyes, ere ends the dream;
I cannot see, when falls the night,
Your tender light.

Oh, do not wait till I am gone,
But speak the cheering words to-day,
And chide me when I go astray;
I cannot hear the chilling tone
When I am gone.

How Did Fire Come?

There are many pretty myths in relation to the origin of fire, and the people of ancient times had many theories about it.

No doubt when they saw the lightning flashing in the sky they formed some ideas regarding it, especially when they observed that if it touched a tree it became a pillar of fire in an instant.

In autumn, when they saw the forest trees aglow with flaming colors, they were impressed with their beauty and grandeur, and unexpressed ideas of fire must have awakened in their minds. They must have thought the lightning had been playing among the trees. The scarlet feathers of the Southern birds must have told them, also, a story of flame and fire. There is an old legend that says: "The fire is a bird with flaming crest and glowing wings. It flew from the heavenly ash-tree and alighted upon one of our trees, and the glory of its presence burned the earth-tree to ashes." From this arose the story of the phoenix. After awhile, any bird that had color on its breast or wings would be called a lightning bird, as the robin red-breast, the oriole, and the black-bird, with a red feather in its wings. These were regarded as the bearers of fire from the skies.

When in California last year I saw an implement for making fire in primitive times. It was done by rubbing two sticks together until the friction produced flame. The instrument was made by Navarino, an Indian aged 107 years. My friend, Mr. Emory Munyan, promised to have Navarino make a similar one for me, which he did, and it was sent to me after my return home.

This curious way of producing fire must have been hailed with delight in the old time. It was, no doubt, regarded as a great and grand achievement, and no wonder the people worshiped it, and kept the symbol as sacred, never letting the fires upon the altars go out. To them the sun and the stars were emblems of fire that they regarded with great awe and reverence.

It was another advance when fire was made by means of flint and steel, and it was probably thought that the very acme of perfection was reached in friction-matches. In our time electricity is made to do what was formerly done by two sticks, flint, and matches. Thus progress and invention bring light in various ways and by many strange devices.

Nature is a great and good mother, and she carries in her bosom everything for the comfort and well-being of her children.

A Brave Soldier.

There are men who, after a battle, die of imaginary wounds, and there are others who seem incapable of realizing actual danger. Of the latter class was a brave fellow whose courage is thus described in Regis de Trobriand's "Four Years with the Army of the Potomac."

He was a strapping Irishman, whom I found smoking his pipe at the door of the hall where lay the wounded.

"Well," said I to him, "how do you find yourself?"

"Perfectly, colonel. Never better in my life."

"Why have you got your face half covered with bandages, then?"

"Oh, a mere nothing—a scratch. I'll show it to you."

"No, I thank you."

"Yes, yes, you will see what it is."

Raising compresses and bandages, he showed me a gaping wound in the place of the eyebrows, which had been carried away.

"I see," said I, "that your wound has not been dressed this morning."

"No, the doctor put this on yesterday; but to-day he's so busy with the others, who need his help more than I, that I didn't want to bother him."

"And your eye?"

"Gone. But you see, colonel, it's only the left eye, and that will save me the trouble of closing it while I take aim, which always did bother me. In a fortnight I'll be back with the regiment."

But the brave fellow never did rejoin his regiment. Before the fortnight was over he had died of this "mere nothing" of which he had made so light. —Pittsburg Dispatch.

A Good One at Last.

"Did I tell you the latest bright thing my little boy got off?" asked McBride, as he joined a group of friends at the club.

"Yes, you did," replied all, in concert, with discouraging unanimity.

"That's where I've caught you," retorted McBride, "for it only happened last evening, and I haven't seen a soul of you fellows since. Besides, this was really a good one."

"Then you haven't told it to us," replied Kilduff, speaking for the crowd. "Go on."

"Yes, tell us quickly," added Skidmore, "and let us have the agony over."

Thus encouraged, McBride began: "You know, boys, little people have sharp ears, and they are not at all backward about telling any little scraps of information they pick up. This peculiarity has led a good many parents to resort to spelling words when their young children are present. Of course that sort of thing is of no avail after the youngsters learn to spell. Well, Mrs. McBride and I are in the spelling stage now, and little Freddy is often very much mystified by our remarks to each other.

"Last night we had our new minister to dinner, and Freddy watched the good man helping himself very liberally to biscuits. He thought it a good opportunity to put into use the family verbal cipher, feeling perfectly certain that the minister would find it unintelligible. So he called out, 'Mamma!'

"What is it, Freddy?" asked my wife.

"Mamma, isn't the m-i-n-i-s-t-e-r a p-i-g?" spelled out Freddy, triumphantly."

The fellows had to admit that this story about McBride's boy was really a good one. —Hurper's Magazine.

What the Little Folks Are Saying.

Florence was communicating a bit of information to her brother Meryl. "Pooh," said Meryl, "I knew that before." "But I knew it first," persisted Florence. "You couldn't, for I have known it ever since the world was made," declared Meryl, triumphantly. "I knew it before God was made," said Florence, "so that settles it."

One day this same Florence found a catechism, and coaxed her mamma to read aloud the questions, which she answered. When she came to the part relating to the crucifixion of Jesus, this question came up: "What was given to Jesus to drink while on the cross?" Without a moment's hesitation, Florence answered: "Hire's root beer!" The look of consternation and dismay following this reply may be imagined, but not portrayed.

Right Living.

H. C. Tripp, of Kingsley, Iowa, writes thus of "Right Living": "It is one of the most wholesome and readable volumes I have read in many days. It deserves a place in every home." Mr. Tripp is the author of a volume of poems entitled, "Around the Fireside." It contains many beautiful gems, among them being one on "Freedom," and inscribed to our worthy friend, Otto Wettstein, whose picture also adorns a page. This picture and poem are worth the price of the book. —Ed. C. C.

Correspondence.

MILLEDGEVILLE, ILL., Aug. 24, 1895.

MISS SUSAN H. WIXON: As I have read five of your books, I wish to write and tell you how well I like them. I think "Right Living" is grand. It contains some of the best thoughts I have ever read.

My only sister wrote to me some time ago, and that encouraged me to write also. We are alone in our views in the community, but care not.

I have been doing considerable elocutionary work lately. I have taken one gold medal in the county as second-best in the rural schools, and have also taken a Demorest silver medal. On Wednesday next I enter at the county fair for a gold medal. My piece is "Kate Shelly," which I chose because a woman was the chief actor in it.

We don't take THE TRUTH SEEKER now, but intend to renew our subscription.

I would thank any Corner friend ever so much who would be kind enough to send me the piece entitled "Grant at Vicksburg," by George Remsburg, I think.

Mr. J. E. Remsburg lectured at Milledgeville one week ago. I had the piece I spoke of, but lent it before I committed it, and never regained it. I wish to learn it and deliver it in the future. I will gladly send any piece I have to anyone sending it to me.

Your friend and admirer,

MATTY AVLYN HUNTER.

[Thanks, Matty, for kind appreciation of our books. We are proud of the attainments of a girl who wins gold and silver medals. Live truly, and honors will be easy, not only for Matty but for all. Always pleased to hear from you. Regards to sister. —Ed. C. C.]

ROB'T G. INGERSOLL

The Field-Ingersoll Discussion. Price, 25 cents.

In 1888 the Rev. Dr. Henry M. Field wrote an open letter to Colonel Ingersoll, with the intent to convert him. The letter was published in the North American Review, and was replied to by the person addressed. All our older readers know the value of this discussion. To those who do not remember it we can only say that they should lose no time in procuring a copy if they want a controversial treat.

The Ingersoll-Gladstone Controversy about Christianity. Price, 25 cents.

When the Field-Ingersoll Controversy closed in the North American Review the Christians felt that their champion had been very badly worsted in argument, and the publishers of the Review engaged the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone to attempt to rehabilitate the Presbyterian creed. He wrote a long letter to Colonel Ingersoll, to which the latter replied at length and, it is generally agreed, completely demolished the greatest controversialist Christianity can produce. These letters are now for the first time available in pamphlet form.

Myth and Miracle. Price, 25c.

This is one of Colonel Ingersoll's best lectures, but never before put into print. Everyone who has heard it will most certainly want it, and those who have not heard it will have a rare treat in its perusal, as something new from the Colonel, which also is something that everybody is looking for.

THE BRAIN AND BIBLE;
OR
THE CONFLICT BETWEEN MENTAL SCIENCE AND THEOLOGY.
By EDGAR C. BEALL, M.D.,
with a preface by
R. G. INGERSOLL.
This is the only work of its kind in the literature of Freethought. Its arguments are based upon scientific phrenology, and appeal directly to the reader's sense of logic and love of justice. It is eloquent as well as convincing.

By the census of 1890, the above is the value of
Church Property
in the United States.
Should It Be Exempt from Taxation?
REASONS WHY IT SHOULD NOT.
Our pamphlet with this title contains an Argument for Equality of Taxation, and a Statement of Facts, giving, from the Census of 1890, the Value, by Denominations, of Church Property in the United States and in the several States and Territories and in all Cities having 25,000 or more inhabitants; so arranged as to show at a glance the relative standing as to Wealth of the Leading Denominations and Denominational Groups. Also, much other matter of especial interest to certain Cities, States, and Sections, all comparisons being based upon official figures. This pamphlet is the only one of the kind published. In no other work are the facts, figures, and arguments to be found. The figures, being derived from the Government Census of 1890, will not be superseded until the census of 1900 shall have been completed—probably about eight years hence. The arguments are unanswerable and will have the dew of morning on them so long as the injustice of church exemption is suffered to exist.
By single copies the price is 15 cents, but as the work is published specially for distribution by those who favor justice in taxation the following reductions are made:
Ten copies..... $1.00
Fifty copies..... 4.50
One hundred copies..... 8.00
Larger quantities at special rates.

400 Years OF Freethought

By Samuel Porter Putnam

Large Octavo, 1165 pp., Gilt Sides and Back, Marbled Edges. $5.
With The Truth Seeker for One Year, $6.50.

141 FULL-PAGE PORTRAITS!
Of the Most Eminent Freethinkers, of the Past Four Hundred Years.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY announced in October that this superb work was at last ready for delivery. It had been in preparation for so long that some of the subscribers were getting a little impatient and wondering when they would have the opportunity to see for themselves whether it possessed all the merits claimed for it by the publishers. They did not realize the magnitude of the work, and that the six months' delay in getting it out was due to the fact that they were to have fifty per cent more reading than they had been promised and nearly three times as many portraits. Such was the case, however. Instead of six hundred pages of letter-press there are nearly nine hundred, and the fifty portraits promised in the prospectus have multiplied to one hundred and forty-one! Considering the fact that the illustrations are the most costly part of the book—as undoubtedly to many they will also be the most attractive—and properly estimating the expense of the extra three hundred pages of text, it is evident that the subscriber received about one hundred per cent more for his $5 than was guaranteed to him. Well, the nearly eleven hundred copies of the volume subscribed for were sent out, and now we know what the recipients think of their investment. Judging by the letters that reach this office, they are not only satisfied—more than satisfied—but surprised and delighted that they got such a bargain.

As for the subject matter of FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT, it covers nearly every phase of progress and development and presents them in such orderly sequence as to give the best possible picture of human evolution. In Part First we have Freethought as a manifestation and influence; in Part Second, as an organized force. With this history are given sketches of the lives of the men and women who have taken part in the movement. It unites the past and the present. It is a world book and a home book. It fulfils the promise of its inception, and is the most magnificent work ever issued by the Freethought Press.

WITH DAUGHTER'S BABE UPON HIS KNEES.

A new edition of that splendid prose poem "Life," by "the prince of orators," Col. R. G. Ingersoll. It is larger and better than the old edition, and can be framed or placed upon the table as an ornament. In the center of the card appear the portraits of the Colonel and the baby, surrounded by the prose poem, which has been truthfully described as "one of the masterpieces of the orator and poet, who now, as far as we know, stands alone in the living world." It will make a delightful present, and will be a souvenir not only of intellectual greatness, but of artistic workmanship. It is printed on heavy board, gilt boveled edge. The size is 12x16 inches, and the price only 75 cents, post-paid.

It was a very hot day, and when Mr. Dunnigan happened to meet his daughter with her friend, he, wishing to do the polite thing, invited them to have some ice cream, an invitation which was at once accepted. When they were seated at the table in the ice cream parlor, Mr. Dunnigan, addressing his daughter's friend, affably inquired, "An' phot koind will yez hav, me dear?" "I will take some orange ice," she replied. Mr. Dunnigan's brow darkened, and glaring at the young lady malevolently, he thundered, "Av yez do, ye'll arder it yersilf."—Harper's Magazine.

MR. GOBEL [American missionary in Japan] built himself a modern house on what is known as "the Bluff," south of Yokohama, and surrounded his grounds with the first fence that was ever built in this part of the world. It was made of bamboo palings, and the boys in the neighborhood used to annoy the good missionary greatly by rattling sticks against it as they ran along the street. The British admiral lived just above him and had a very natty Tommy Atkins for an orderly. He wore a little round cap on the northeast corner of his head and always carried a little cane of rattan in his hand. One morning, having been sent with a message, he appeared before the admiral with his face bruised to a jelly and his uniform tattered and torn, and covered with dust. "Mercy on us!" exclaimed the admiral, in astonishment at the spectacle, "what has happened to you?" "I beg your pardon, sir," replied Tommy, "but, has I was coming halong hup the 'ill a-rubbing my stick hagaint the missionary's fence, 'e came hout in 'is pyjamas and said as 'ow 'e 'ad vowed by the grace of God to lick the 'ide hof the next man who did that, and 'e 'as done it, sir."

AN INCOMPLETE REVELATION
While Quaker folks were Quakers st'ill, some fifty years ago,
When coats were drab and gowns were plain and speech was staid and slow,
Before Dame Fashion dared suggest a single friz or curl,
There dwelt, 'mid Penfield's peaceful shades, an old-time Quaker girl.
Ruth Wilson's garb was of her sect. Devoid of furbelows,
She spoke rebuke to vanity, from bonnet to her toes;
Sweet redbird was she, all disguised in feathers of the dove,
With dainty foot and perfect form and eyes that dreamt of love.

Sylvanus Moore, a bachelor of forty years or so,
A quaintly, pious, weazened soul, with hair and beard of tow,
And queer thin legs and shuffling walk and drawling, nasal tone,
Was prompted by the Spirit to make this maid his own.

He knew it was the Spirit, for he felt it in his breast
As oft before in meeting time, and, sure of his request,
Procured the permit in due form. On Fourth day of that week
He let Ruth know the message true that he was moved to speak.

"Ruth, it has been revealed to me that thee and I shall wed;
I hav spoken to the meeting and the members all hav said
That our union seems a righteous one, which they will not gainsay,
So, if convenient to thy views, I'll wed thee next Third-day."

The cool possession of herself by friend
Sylvanus Moore Aroused her hot resentment, which by effort she forbore,
(She knew he was a goodly man, of simple, childlike mind),
And checked the word "impertinence!"
and answered him in kind:

"Sylvanus Moore, do thee go home and wait until I see
The fact that I must be thy wife revealed unto me."
And thus she left him there alone, at will to ruminate,
Sore puzzled at the mysteries of Love,
Free Will, and Fate.

Ingersoll on the Decision of the United States Court that the Civil Rights Act is Unconstitutional. Fifty-three large octavo pages, of which Colonel Ingersoll's speech occupies 88 pages.

PULPIT, PEW, AND CRADLE. So long as the Pulpit speaks to believing Pews composed chiefly of mothers, the cradle will be rocked by ghosts and the race will remain on its knees to a devil of its own creation and to a God who is powerless against him. One of Helen Gardner's brightest efforts.

THE RELIGION OF HUMANITY BETTER THAN ETERNAL PUNISHMENT. M. Babcock.

RELIGIOUS PROBLEMS. One of L. K. Washburn's best lectures, and it is, like all of his, very good.

THE ROARING LION ON THE TRACK. One of M. Babcock's comical sermons.

SCIENCE vs. RELIGION, or The Conflict Between Reason and Superstition. T. C. Widd comba.

ST. MATTHEW BEFORE THE COURT. Presenting the evidence of the forgery of his alleged gospel. H. J. Seigneur.

SISTER LUCY AND HER AWFUL DISCLOSURES REGARDING NEW HALL CONVENT. Showing that Convents are inimical to chastity, virtue, and freedom.

SPIRITUALISM FROM A MATERIALISTIC STANDPOINT. B. F. Underwood. Written before Mr. Underwood joined the Psychic Researchers.

THUMBSCREW AND RACK. Torture Implements Employed in the 15th and 16th centuries for the promulgation of Christianity. Being the Nuremberg Collection, with specimens from the Holy Inquisition. 28 pictures. The descriptions and reflections by George E. Macdonald.

VICTOR HUGO'S ORATION ON VOLTAIRE, delivered on the one hundredth anniversary of Voltaire's death. Translated by James Parton, author of the Life of Voltaire. To which are added the three great poems of Goethe, George Eliot, and Longfellow.

WAS CHRIST CRUCIFIED? Austin Bierbower. A lawyer's consideration of the evidence of that alleged event.

WAS JESUS INSANE? A consideration of Christ's alleged acts which would lead one to that conclusion. L. K. Washburn.

WHY DON'T HE LEND A HAND? And other Agnostic Poems. Samuel P. Putnam. The title poem is perhaps the most popular of Mr. Putnam's many poems, and a great many editions of it have been called for. The other poems are: The Golden Age, The Ideal and the Real, Not Dead, but Living, Fruition, Hope, Thomas Paine, Nature's Gospel, Address to Deity, and the short poems so often recited with great effect by Charles Watts, Give Us Light.

WILL THE COMING MAN WORSHIP GOD? B. F. Underwood; written before Mr. Underwood joined the Psychic Researchers.

WOMAN: FOUR CENTURIES OF PROGRESS. A lecture delivered at the Freethinkers' International Congress at Chicago. Considering: The Cause of Woman's Subjugation, The Canon Law and Its Effects Upon Her, Theology Never Helpful to Woman, Invention Woman's Friend, Freethought the Benefactor of Woman. Susan H. Wixon.

WOMAN: HER PAST AND PRESENT, HER RIGHTS AND WRONGS. A lecture delivered before the Woman Suffrage Association of Denver, Col., by B. F. Underwood.

Any one of the above for ten cents, and twelve for a dollar.

In the nature of things,

RAYA

ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

"In the nature of things there can be no evidence to establish the claim of inspiration." Such is the text of the Colonel's new lecture entitled

All About the Holy Bible

Just published in a large and handsome pamphlet. Price 25 cents. Address The Truth Seeker Co., New York.

The Great Ingersoll Controversy

Containing the famous Christmas Sermon by Colonel Ingersoll, the protests thereby evoked from the ministers who think they own this country and all therein, and Colonel Ingersoll's replies to the same. A finely gotten up pamphlet. Price, 25 cents.

Liberty for Man, Woman, and Child

"Reading this lecture," remarked a friend the other day, "will make men better; for if a man reads it one night on his way home, the next night he will take along some oranges or something to his family." This lecture is gotten up in the handsome style of "Voltaire" and "Lincoln," and has as a frontispiece a fine photo engraving of the Colonel and both his grandchildren, Eva and Robert, the little fellow upon his knee, and Eva in her high chair. It is a pretty picture, and the Colonel's millions of friends will take pleasure in it. In this pamphlet is also the Colonel's Tribute to His Brother, which so many have desired to have in convenient form. Price, 25 cents.

VOLTAIRE

"Voltaire was the greatest man of his century, and did more to free the human race than any other of the sons of men." A lecture by INGERSOLL, with portrait of Voltaire. A handsome pamphlet. Every Freethinker will surely want it. Price, 25 cents.

LINCOLN

This is Colonel INGERSOLL's great lecture, printed in a handsome pamphlet, and containing the Century's famous portrait of Lincoln—said to be the best extant. Price, 25 cents.

SHAKSPERE

"An intellectual ocean, whose waves touched all the shores of thought." A lecture by INGERSOLL, with likeness of Shakspeare from the Kesselstadt death mask. Price, 25 cents.

IS SUICIDE A SIN?

Colonel INGERSOLL's Famous Letters and Replies from Eminent men. With "Great Suicides of History" and Schopenhauer's Essay. 25 cents.

Gems of Thought.

PERSONAL liberty is the paramount essential to human dignity and human happiness.—Bulwer.

It is the function of government to maintain the conditions of liberty, and beyond that to let men alone.—New York World.

ALL sin may be pardoned but the covert it hides in, which must be broken up.—C. A. Bartol. [In other words, hypocrisy must be done to death.]

MANY persons are developed far enough to be jealous of their own liberties. Few persons are sufficiently ample to battle for the liberties of others.—Horace L. Traubel.

I AM not a friend to a very energetic government. It is always oppressiv. It places the governors indeed more at their ease at the expense of the people.—Thomas Jefferson.

LET every one insist on reality and sincerity, and refrain as much as he can from complimentary usages which involve untruths. If each resolves to tell as few tacit lies as possible, social intercourse will be much healthier.—Herbert Spencer.

IF any man is able to convince me and show me that I do not think or act right, I will gladly change; for I seek the truth, by which no man was ever injured. But he is injured who abides in his error and ignorance.—M. Aurelius Antoninus.

THERE is no alleviation for the sufferings of mankind except veracity of thought and of action, and the resolute facing of the world as it is when the garment of make-believe by which pious hands have hidden its uglier features is stripped off.—Huxley.

ART should refine our sense of character and conduct, of justice and sympathy, greatly heightening our self-knowledge, self-control, precision of action, and consideration, and making us intolerant of baseness, cruelty, injustice, and intellectual superficiality or vulgarity.—George Bernard Shaw, in Liberty.

It is fashionable to say that he [Voltaire] was not profound. This is because he was not stupid. In the presence of absurdity he laughed, and was called irreverent. He thought God would not damn even a priest forever—this was regarded as blasphemy. He endeavored to prevent Christians from murdering each other, and did what he could to civilize the disciples of Christ. Had he founded a sect, obtained control of some country, and burned a few heretics at slow fires, he would have won the admiration, respect, and love of the Christian world. Had he only pretended to believe all the fables of antiquity, had he mumbled Latin prayers, counted beads, crossed himself, devoured now and then the flesh of God, and carried fagots to the feet of Philosophy in the name of Christ, he might have been in heaven this moment, enjoying the sight of the damned.—Ingersoll.

WHEN the notion is once firmly implanted in the mind that the source of honor is from without rather than from within, it must invariably happen that the possession of external distinction will be preferred to the sense of internal power. In such cases the majesty of the human intellect and the dignity of human knowledge are considered subordinate to those mock and spurious gradations by which weak men measure the degrees of their own littleness. To talk of the pride of hereditary rank is a contradiction in terms. The proud man sees in his own mind the source of his own dignity. The vain man, restless, insatiable, and always craving after the admiration of his contemporaries, must naturally make great account of those external marks, those visible tokens, which, whether they be decorations or titles, strike directly on the senses, and thus captivate the vulgar, to whose understandings they are immediately obvious.—Buckle.

The public schools exalt rather than debase womanhood. While they tend to destroy the assumptions of dogma, and weaken the authority of ecclesiastical organizations, they, on the other hand, strengthen, exalt, and idealize the authority of truth. Who dare say this is not advantageous to the individual and to society? Truth understood and obeyed will care for us all here and hereafter, in this or another world. We recognize that the public schools make it more difficult for the church to control its communicants, because of the higher demands made upon the church. Intelligence is ever exacting, both intellectually and morally. This is the chief reason for the public school, and any church which is unwilling to meet the most exalted demands of the age, any church which will not urge its communicants to participate in the noblest opportunities, to that extent declares its weakness.—Progressiv Age, replying to Cardinal Gibbons.

THE ELIXIR OF LIFE

is not in magic potions, "specifics" or electric clap-trap, but only in WISDOM—THE SCIENCE OF HEALTH. Wise men study nature, shun disease learn to maintain vigor and regain it by reading the most complete book of Medical, Social, Sexual Science, by an eminent physician of 35 years experience. The "old, original, standard" work, endorsed by all, imitated by many, equalled by none. Inspired by wish to aid humanity, it has providentially saved thousands. Its essays on marriage, parentage, adaptation, marital failures, etc., are of inestimable value to all now married or who ever expect to be. The last edition has 1,000 pages, 3 colored charts of vital organs, 200 wood cuts, 21 chromos showing origin of life—development of man. APPENDIX has over 200 Recipes. A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—[Freethinkers' Magazine.]

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of his volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—[Boston Investigator.]

A small farm of 10 acres 86 perches, located within one and a half miles of Media county seat and within four miles of Chester, Pa., on the Delaware river. Several springs of soft water. good timber growing on the place, some choice apple and pear trees in fruiting condition. House and barn on the place, but are old buildings. Within five minutes walk of the railroad station, 9 miles from Philadelphia. Trolley line between Media and Chester, with less than five minutes walk.

The place is specially well located for a florist, and it would be a fine summer residence for one who would put a modern house on it. Eight years ago the land adjoining sold for $618 per acre, and no land near it has sold as low as that since. Several smaller places have sold at $1,000 per acre. The land slopes toward the southwest, overlooking beautiful woodland scenery.

News of the Week.

The grand conclave of the Knights Templar was in session in Boston last week.

On Aug. 29th a torpedo boat upset in the North Sea and thirteen persons were drowned.

The prospects for fall trade are excellent, so the manufacturers and merchants are saying.

MORE rioting is reported from China, the nativ Christians being the sufferers in this instance.

It is reported from Shanghai that there were 40,000 deaths from cholera in Peking during August.

MAYOR SWIFT, of Chicago, ordered that no red flags should appear in the Socialistic reception to Keir Hardie.

It is rumored that Turkish soldiers and Kurds have attacked the town of Kemakh and several villages in Armenia.

The CHINESE government has granted the French missions in the Sechuen province an indemnity of 4,000,000 francs.

By cloudbursts in Algeria and Mexico on Aug. 28th fourteen lives were lost in the first-named country and eight in the last.

By the sudden descent of water into the shaft of the Sleepy Hollow mine at Central City, Col., on Aug. 29th, twelve miners were drowned.

CHOLERA has broken out in Honolulu. There had been eight deaths at latest reports. The same disease is spreading rapidly in southwestern Russia.

JOHN MORLEY is engaged in writing a history of the present century. It is a stupendous undertaking, and has occupied his spare time for several years.

A VERY severe electrical storm swept over New York and vicinity late Saturday afternoon, Aug. 31st. Considerable damage was done and an inch of water fell in twenty minutes.

At the Erie, Pa., centennial there will be a parade of Sunday-school children of all denominations. This was decided upon at a convention of Catholic, Protestant, and Jewish clergymen.

Two Roumanian bear tamers and traders have been arrested in Hungary charged with feeding human flesh to their animals. They have confessed that they killed four boys and fed them to the bears.

The Metropolitan Traction Company of New York has at last decided to substitute the underground trolley for horse and cable power as rapidly as it can be done. They now use about 6,000 horses.

The first white man to be hanged in Africa has just paid the penalty. He was an ex-missionary named Stokes, and he was hanged in the Congo Free State for supplying arms to the Arabs for their war on his own race. He made a fortune in trade.

By the vote of 60 to 46 the New York Liquor Dealers' Association voted to submit to the Sunday law. This is not binding on the non-members, of course, and it is hinted that it will not be respected by the minority of the members.

On Aug. 30th there were arrested at Penn's Grove, N. J., twenty Cubans, who were taken to Wilmington, Del., and put in jail. Twenty-eight cases of arms and ammunition were seized. The arrest was ordered by Secretary Carlisle.

NEW YORK policemen serve their masters by going in disguise into the delicatessen stores on the East side and buying something for the purpose of getting a chance to arrest the proprietors. This is called "disciplining" the police.

On Aug. 29th a strike of the employees of the Cordage Trust began in the jute mill of the American Manufacturing Company at Greenpoint, L. I., when 500 men, boys, and girls went out. The strike may become general in the works of the Cordage Trust.

BIBLES must be scarce in Tennessee, where Henry Hammel was arrested for stealing one from a bookstand. He was a laborer and said: "I didn't mean any wrong; I just wanted to read the book and had no money to buy one." Where are the Bible and home missionary societies with their millions of Bibles and dollars?

THE Treasury Department has declined to admit free of duty the clothes and sword of the Duke of Wellington worn by him at Waterloo, and Napoleon's hat and sword worn by him on the same occasion. The intention of the importer was to exhibit them in this country for pay. Dead saints, for exhibition for pay in Catholic churches, are admitted free.

WILLIAM STRONG, ex-associate justice of the United States Supreme Court, died at Lake Minnewaska, N. Y., Aug. 19th. He was born in Somers, Conn., in 1808. He affiliated with the God-in-the-Constitution Association as early as 1864, the year the national organization was perfected, and while he was on the bench of the supreme court of Pennsylvania.

At 6:10 A. M., Sept. 1st, a distinct earthquake shock was felt in Eastern New York, Delaware, New Jersey, and Eastern Pennsylvania. The vibration was from north to south and lasted about ten seconds. Of it and its effects, the World says: "In a few places the more ignorant or more superstitious part of the inhabitants were thrown into paroxysms of terror, and betook themselves to their knees, their prayers and their Bibles."

WILLIAM STEINWAY, the piano manufacturer, is preparing to enter upon the manufacture of horseless carriage motors on a large scale, at the Long Island village bearing his name. The motor is the Daimler, which won the grand prize in the international race between Paris and Rouen, in 1894, the gold medal and first prize at Turin, and the first, second, third, and fourth prizes in the round trip race between Paris and Bordeaux, last June.

The fuel is petroleum, producing gas explosions at regular intervals.

SIXTY-NINE excursionists were injured, many very seriously, in a Labor-day collision on the Sea Beach railway between New York and Coney Island. The disaster was caused by a runaway engine which had been abandoned with reversed lever after previously colliding with another engine. It overtook and struck the excursion train in the rear, telescoping four cars.

THE United States district attorney and the marshal of Wyoming report to Washington that Tanega, the Bannock Indian killed in the late "war," was atrociously murdered by Constable Manning and his deputies, but that it will be useless to try to bring them to justice, as the commissioner before whom the case would have to be brought is in sympathy with the outlaws and gave them the advice upon which they acted. It is suggested that the commissioner should be removed.

Special NEW SUBSCRIBER Offer.

We wish, for two good and valid reasons, to greatly extend the circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER. First, we want its influence for good and its efforts for greater liberty of thought to be more widely distributed, and consequently more effective. Second, we want more subscribers to help pay its expenses and enable us to do more work. And we wish to emphasize both of these reasons. Our present subscribers can do a great deal for us if they will, and to get them to aid us we are willing to reward them; we therefore make this SPECIAL NEW SUBSCRIBER OFFER:

To any subscriber now on our list who will get a new name for the list for one year, sending us three dollars for the same, we will send free a copy of the FREETHINKER'S PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK, in board covers (price two dollars).

And to anyone whose name is not now on our list we make this offer: Send us three dollars for the paper one year, and we will send you free the PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK.

The pictures in the FREETHINKER'S PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK were made and the text written to show the absurdity and untruthfulness of the Church's claim to being a divine and infallible institution, and to reveal the abuses of a union of church and state. This offer cannot apply to renewals. Premiums for them can be found on the second page of this issue. We are giving five dollars' worth for three in this offer, and there is no profit in it except that we shall get many renewals of these subscriptions; the subscribers will also, probably, buy a few books from time to time, and the small margin on them may make us whole. Induce your neighbor to subscribe, and so get the book for yourself. Or, if you are not now a subscriber, send us three dollars and get both paper and book—FIVE DOLLARS' WORTH FOR THREE DOLLARS.

Read what the papers and people have said of the book and see if it is not worth while to make a strong effort to obtain it. The book has had a large run; five thousand copies have been sold, and everyone who paid two dollars for it says it is worth a good deal more. Now we are giving it away, and you can get a copy if you will. Do not delay, but get it now.

SPECIMEN PRESS NOTICES.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait-painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—Freethinkers' Magazine.

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of this volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—Boston Investigator.

What a New Subscriber, Who Has Received His Pictorial Text-Book, Says of It.

LAMAR, MO., May 8, 1895.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: The "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book" is received, and after a careful examination of the work I unhesitatingly pronounce it one of the most impressive Freethought works ever issued from the press. It will indeed "corner the parson" and all his flock, and I shall take great pleasure in showing the book to my orthodox friends. As a reference book it is invaluable, and it should find a place in every Freethinker's library. Respectfully, W. F. BRILEY.

For $6.50 we will send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year ($3) and S. P. Putnam's "Four Hundred Years of Freethought" ($5). Large Octavo, 1150 pages, gilt sides and back, marbled edges—the most magnificent work ever issued by the Freethought Press. 140 Half Tone Engravings of the Prominent Freethinkers of the past four centuries.

The object of this work is to present the Course of Freethought throughout the Civilized World from the time of Columbus and Bruno to the time of Ingersoll. It is a radical Historic Record of the greatest developments of the human race. It reveals Freethought as an intellectual, moral, literary, social, industrial, and political movement. It shows what Freethought is in itself, how manifold are its influences, and with what promise we can hail its future triumph. "FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT" embraces the most illustrious pages of human history, adorned with the brightest genius, radiant with the most splendid poetry, rich with the greatest inventions and discoveries, and ennobled with freedom's most shining advance. Nothing can be more interesting or more inspiring to the pioneer workers of to-day, to those who are still in the van for human rights and progress. No Liberal can afford to be without this book. It contains the greatest thoughts and the greatest deeds of the greatest men in one harmonious and magnificent whole, a vivid picture of man's sublimest evolution, with the added glory of woman's emancipation from the chains and slavery of a barbaric church.

Darwin and After Darwin

An Exposition of the Darwinian Theory.

By GEORGE J. ROMANES.

A systematic Exposition of what may be termed the Darwinism of Darwin, and intended to be of service to the general reader rather than to professional naturalists.

Mr. Romanes is well known as one of the most interesting of English writers upon evolution, besides ranking with Professor Huxley in scientific knowledge and ability. And this is a part of his conclusion regarding the great subject of Design, to which the Church so often refers: "Thus whether we look to the facts of adaptation or to those of beauty, everywhere throughout organic nature we meet with abundant evidence of natural causation, while nowhere do we meet with any independent evidence of supernatural design. Adaptation and beauty are alike receiving their explanation at the hands of a purely mechanical philosophy. All nature has thus been transformed before the view of the present generation in a manner and to an extent that has never before been possible; and inasmuch as the change which has taken place has taken place in the direction of naturalism, and this to the extent of rendering the mechanical interpretation of nature universal, it is no wonder if the religious mind has suddenly awakened to a new and a terrible force in the words of its traditional enemy—Where is now thy God?"

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with a little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroine. The narrative is, in the main, a history of a working-girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business-men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrites. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Argument and Action Are Inconsistent.

Judge Owers, of Leadville, Col., recently handed down a decision in a Sunday closing case that is a disgrace to the bench—one of those decisions that tend to bring the administration of law into utter contempt. He denounced the Sunday law of Colorado and demanded its repeal; he talked of "blue laws" and New England "witchcraft"; he favored local option and said that Sunday laws were sumptuary in character; he quoted Cooley's declaration that "the inability to secure a reasonable enforcement of a law is always a strong indication of its unconstitutionality in a free country"; he said that the law undoubtedly had its foundation "in some religious idea" and therefore was not based on any economic or sanitary reason; he affirmed that "Sunday, as a religious institution, can receive no legal recognition without violating the guarantees as to religious liberty made in our Constitution"; he exposed the rest and sanitary pretexts; he said that "the majority of the legislators who aid in enacting such laws expect to and do constantly violate them"; he pointed out that the continual violation of such laws with impunity leads to contempt for all law; he stoutly asserted that "the plea of rest is as indefensible, when made in support of Sunday laws, as are the religious grounds upon which such statutes are sometimes defended," and he proved it; he denounced the persecution of the Adventists in Tennessee and other states; he showed how Sunday laws "encourage bribery and corrupt politics," and he gave a number of other excellent reasons against the Sunday statutes. Yet—amazing stultification—he held the Sunday closing statute with which he was dealing to be constitutional! Has Judge Owers ever read the Bill of Rights of his state? That says that "no person shall ever be denied any civil or political right, privilege, or capacity on account of his opinions concerning religion." Is not such denial of citizen right made when the legislature incorporates in the statutes of the state an edict subjecting to punishment the person who shall refuse to observe the holy day of a church? The citizen punished does not believe that Sunday is a day different from other days or that the church has any right to require him to act as though he believed that it was.

Again, the Bill of Rights declares that no preference shall "be given by law to any religious denomination or mode of worship." Is that not plain enough for Judge Owers to understand it? Observance of Sunday is a mode of worship, and when a law is enacted compelling observance of that day a preference is given to that mode of worship and to the denomination practicing it, as the Seventh-Day Adventists know to their bitter cost. Judge Owers' unconstitutional decision makes a mockery of all his fine words, which, in this case as in many others, "butter no parsnips" and safeguard no rights. "Even the devils believe and tremble," we are told in an old volume, but we do not learn that by doing works meet for repentance they ceased to be devils. We trust that Judge Owers will pardon the scriptural allusion in consideration of the precedent we have in James' censure of those out of whose mouths proceeded both "blessing and cursing," and the denunciation of those others who were neither hot nor cold, but merely discreetly lukewarm.

A Specimen Church Yarn.

About once in six months, and oftener in dull years, the daily papers of some city get from some backwoods district a yarn about the awful effects of some revival upon some unbeliever. This seems to be a dull year, for the yarns might almost be said to come two at a time. The accounts usually portray the said unbeliever in the act of being stricken dumb by lightning while denying the existence of God or reviling the church. Paralytic strokes are also favorite forms of divine vengeance on these occasions, while sometimes the blasphemer is turned into stone. The latest thing of the sort is from Georgia, the home of Methodism in all its superstition and ignorance. It is so good a specimen of what the Christian imagination can do in this line that we give it entire as it appeared in the Atlanta Constitution, a journal somewhat remarkable for its bigoted devotion to untruth as promulgated by the Christian church:

"Tongue Paralyzed—A Blasphemer Struck Dumb while Ridiculing Religious Worship—Now Thinks He Is Doomed to Hell—He Writes a Note to a Preacher and Asks a Congregation to Pray for Him—Many People Converted.

"ATHENS, GA., August 27.—(Special.)—A remarkable story comes from the little town of High Shoals, located fourteen miles from Athens, a story that many may not believe, but which is vouched for by one of the leading members of Oconee street Methodist church, of this city.

"Mr. H. T. Rogers, a steward in Oconee street church, and an old man honored and respected by his fellowmen, returned to-day from High Shoals, where he had been attending a revival held at the Methodist church at that place. Mr. Rogers tells the following awe-inspiring story of an incident that happened at the Shoals Sunday afternoon, and he says it has created a great deal of excitement there.

"The revival has been going on about one week, Rev. J. T. Lowe, a consecrated Methodist minister, having charge of it. A great deal of interest was manifested in it and large numbers of people attended the meetings.

"Among other citizens of High Shoals is Mr. William Haygood, an old gentleman who moved there a short while ago from Princeton Factory. He was marshal of the town of Princeton. Mr. Haygood is an honest, hard-working old man, and for many years was a member of the Methodist church. Lately he has taken up the doctrine of unbelief, preaching against heaven and hell, declaring that no such places exist, and denying many of the claims of Christians as set forth in the Testament. During the progress of the meeting at High Shoals last week, Mr. Haygood would go to the meetings at the church and then collect a crowd of men together and attempt to answer the arguments of the preacher. He declared that the preacher was talking nonsense, that there was nothing in it, and that they wasted their time in going to the meetings. In such a vein he went on, throwing cold water on the revival whenever he got an opportunity.

"Sunday afternoon the services had been concluded, and a crowd collected around Mr. Haygood at Mr. Medlin's store, at the Shoals. Haygood was proceeding in his usual way to argue against the meeting, and the men were listening to what he had to say.

"Suddenly silence fell upon the crowd, as if rooted to the spot. The old man had started a sentence when he suddenly stopped. He attempted to complete it, but he could not utter one syllable. The crowd was dumfounded, but hoped the old man would soon come around all right. But the minutes slipped by and still that tongue was silenced. On rolled the hours, but no sound came from that tongue. In the midst of his argument against religion, his tongue had refused to speak. Was it mere chance paralysis, or was it the finger of God that had been laid upon that unruly member to rebuke the utterances made or to prevent the utterances to come? Those were the questions asked by the crowd of themselves, and a holy awe spread through the crowd.

"Mr. Haygood went to his home, and everything possible was done to restore his speech, but the golden gift came not back. The incident was heralded throughout the town, and there were more prayerful hearts there Sunday night than ever before in the history of High Shoals.

"Monday morning came, and at the appointed hour the meeting was opened at the Methodist church. Mr. Rogers, coming along the road, met Mr. Haygood and spoke to him cordially. He simply touched his lips, for his tongue could not move.

"During the progress of the meeting Mr. Rogers had to take charge in place of Mr. Lowe, the pastor, who had become very much exhausted by reason of preaching three sermons on Sunday previous. Mr. Rogers was leading the meeting and delivering a discourse on Infidelity, telling his experience in discussion with an unbeliever once, and he noticed Mr. Haygood, who sat in the audience in front of him. Mr. Haygood began to tremble and his hands and body shook perceptibly. Tears streamed from his eyes and rolled down his cheek, but the quivering lips could not fashion words to express his thoughts. The congregation noticed him, and looked on with wonder.

"He drew a pencil and a piece of paper from his pocket and wrote nervously a few lines. Then he passed the paper up to the pulpit to Mr. Rogers, who read it aloud to the congregation.

"It was as follows:

"I am doomed to hell. There is a hell. Pray for me.
WILLIAM HAYGOOD."

"The effect upon that congregation was electrical. It seemed as if they were perfectly awe-stricken. The services proceeded, and the religious feeling manifested was very noticeable. In the presence of such a striking incident, the hardest of sinners quivered and became alarmed at his state of mind.

"The next service was Monday night, and on that occasion Mr. Haygood was on hand, but still the power of speech was denied him. He could hear, he could feel, he could see, he could walk, but not one syllable could he utter. When the mourners were called for he went to the altar and fell upon his knees in silent prayer. He arose and went back to his seat in the congregation, but he did not feel as if pardon had yet come, and still he spoke not.

"Mr. Rogers left High Shoals this morning and Mr. Haygood was still speechless. The people of High Shoals have no explanation to make of this wonderful occurrence."

The foregoing creation has been extensively circulated, and has lost nothing on its rounds. At times the man Haguewood is set down as a thorough, dyed-in-the-wool Infidel who made nightly addresses against the church, declaring the preachers to be frauds and deceivers of the people; other papers make him out a backsliding Methodist, while still others stick to the orthodox version that he was affirming there is no God, no heaven, no hell, when his tongue suddenly became paralyzed. The Constitution supplements its first version of the fake by reporting on the following day that Mr. Haguewood's power of speech was restored by his conversion, from which it is to be inferred that God let him talk when he would talk to order. We have on hand five different accounts of the affair, and every mail brings more.

Of course no intelligent person is for a moment deceived by such a canard as this, but to silence ignorant believers who may recite the tale and grinningly call the attention of Freethinkers to it, idiotically hinting that a similar fate awaits all who will not contribute to the support of the preacher, it is well to have the story denied in detail. One of our subscribers, Mr. H. R. Teal, who lives near the scene of the alleged divine visitation, read the yarn in the Constitution and wrote to the gentleman most interested, Mr. William Haguewood, as it turns out that his real name is. In reply this letter was received:

"HIGH SHOALS, GA., Aug. 30, 1895.

"H. R. TEAL, Dear Sir: Yours to hand. In answer to it I write you concerning the article in the Constitution. The revival has been going on, as Brother Rodgers stated. As for me being struck dumb, that is not so. Ever since I was twelve years old my powers of speech would give way at times, and I would go for weeks and could not speak or make one bit of noise. As for my being an unbeliever, I was trying to believe that there was no hell, but the good spirit got hold on me and I am now a believer in the Lord and Savior Jesus Christ. As for my going to meeting and attempting to answer the arguments of the preacher with a crowd gathered around me, that is false. As for being at Mr. Medlin's store on Sunday with a crowd gathered to discuss the subject, that is untrue, for I was not there at all. As for going home and having everything done to restore my speech, that is untrue, for I do not have anything done when I am in that condition.

"Brother Rodgers did conduct the services on Monday morning, but his discourse was not on Infidelity. As for taking my pencil and writing nervously a few lines and passing it to Brother Rodgers—"I am doomed to hell"—that is untrue. I did write this: 'Pray for me, and ask the church to pray for me,' and handed it to Brother Powell, who read it to the congregation and requested them to pray for me. There was no electrical effect upon the congregation. On Monday night, when there was an invitation for prayer, I went, and God for Christ's sake pardoned me, and I am now happy in the enjoyment of the religion of Jesus Christ.

"As for my disease, the doctors say it is a spinal affection, and have treated me accordingly. I am now fifty-nine years old, the fourteenth day of September. There was no excitement at all at this place, as all here knew me and knew my condition.

"I am your friend, WILLIAM HAGUEWOOD."

From this it will readily be seen that the imagination of the reporter is a most active and fertile one, and also that the brethren who vouched for the imposture are equally ready to tell pious lies. The sudden silence of God's victim is naturally explained, and it is found that he never was an Infidel, so that—had the divine visitation been a reality instead of the fake of a space-filler on a paper published for the ignorant—the almighty was wreaking vengeance on one of his supporters. Judging from the letter of Mr. Haguewood, whose orthography and construction we have taken the liberty to revise, he is an unlettered person of about the right caliber mentally to make a good Methodist. That he ever even tried to believe there is no hell is surprising, considering his surroundings and his evident church training. He seems, however, to be honest, and has not yielded to the solicitation of the preachers to maintain the truth of false reports and thus make capital for his religion at the expense of facts. His letter is a complete and circumstantial denial of the whole affair, and puts Brother Rodgers and the reporter in an unpleasant light if they care at all for their reputations for veracity, which is not likely.

Christian Failure in China.

The New York Tribune recently contained a letter from Rev. Mr. Donehoo, a Presbyterian minister of Pittsburg, in which he said, in effect, that while strongly in favor of missionary work he did not believe that the Chinese could be converted to Christianity. Referring to his experience with them in this country, he says:

"I have never yet found one who gave evidence of thorough conversion to Christianity, though I have known a large number who have been in our Sabbath schools and a few who have professed conversion."

If this is the best that the church can do here, where the Chinese are surrounded by Christians and the ministers can make use of all possible agencies in the work of attempted conversion, what obstacles must be presented to the missionaries among the teeming millions of China itself? The New York Sun remarks:

"Moreover his [Mr. Donehoo's] observations among the Chinamen who have immigrated to this country coincide with the reports sent and brought by many of our navy officers, and by American and European merchants and other representatives who have visited China and lived among the people. They all bear witness to the devotion of the Christian missionaries there, but they express the opinion that the self-sacrifice is almost wholly wasted, so far as the Chinamen are concerned. Like Mr. Donehoo, they question the genuineness of the conversions of which the missionaries are so hopeful, saying that they are almost invariably due to the interested motives which have gained for the supposititious converts the title of 'rice converts' in China, or people who have professed Christianity for the sake of the loaves and fishes distributed among them by the missionaries."

How much longer will the missionary boards be able to draw millions yearly from the credulous Christians of Europe and America for the conversion of people who cannot be converted? How long before other Christians will accept the conclusions reached by the editor of the Sun?

"The inference from Mr. Donehoo's remarks and their confirmation by American and European visitors to China is that the enormous self-sacrifice which the insignificant results of missionary effort cost can be expended elsewhere with far greater practical returns. It is that, in their humanity, zealous and devoted men and women ought not to be stimulated to risk their lives in vain attempts to convert to Christianity a people whose evangelization has been proved in actual experience to be impossible."

But what is the Sun going to do about the positive command of Jesus to his disciples to go out and preach the gospel to every creature? Has that order been countermanded? Is it not the duty of the Christian to implicitly obey his Lord? Has he any warrant to set up his experience and his common sense against the instructions of his Commander, which he finds in the Bible? Some time since we quoted the declaration of a very influential Catholic missionary, who said that he had absolutely no hope of the conversion of the Orient. When asked why, if thus despairing of ultimate success, he continued in the field, he replied to the effect that he simply obeyed the before-mentioned command of his Savior. Can Rev. Mr. Donehoo, Presbyterian minister, and Mr. Charles A. Dana, Christian journalist, do less?

Liberals in Oregon and Washington will bear in mind that the state convention of the Oregon Secular Union is to be held in Portland Sept. 20th to 22d, inclusive. Those who propose to attend should write to the secretary, C. B. Reynolds, 620 Seventh street, Portland, Or., who will arrange for their cordial reception.

The Milwaukee Journal, speaking of the common notion that dogs are more apt to go mad during "dog days" than at other times, says that "popular superstition has joined dog days and mad dogs, and for this there is no divorce court but a growing intelligence." That is the only cure for all other superstitions, including the belief that Sunday is a holy day, and its running mate, the absurd delusion that because the opinion of fifty-one men is that Sunday should be observed as a holiday by everybody, the forty-ninth man of the other forty-nine of the one hundred in the community—he chancing to be a peace officer—is in honor bound to compel his forty-eight dissenting associates to do just as the fifty-one day-worshippers think they ought.

In this city as elsewhere where Puritanism is in the saddle, the attention of the courts is occupied in "rushing through" suits against the violators of the Sunday law, while real crimes go unpunished. Long ago the persons held responsible for the poor construction of the building in Orchard street, in the fall of which several lives were snuffed out, were indicted, but the courts have not had time to try them. This is but one case out of very many which could be cited. At the same time the men whose only offense is that they rendered their fellows a service which was desired and asked for are given the shortest possible shrift. Amateur societies, peace officers, and courts all seem to have much more inclination and leisure for meddling and invasion than for defense. The more influence the church secures in the legislature and the court room, the more we have of this trifling with the scales of justice. We notice that the other day Father Ducey of St. Leo sat on the bench with Recorder Goff while the latter was enforcing law "because it is law," taking the property of the citizen "without due process of law" as the Constitution contemplated. In Catholic Mexico Father Ducey could not thus sit beside the civil magistrate to bias his decisions and terrorize the victims of oppression. Whither are we drifting? How long before some Catholic or Protestant Ducey will sit, as a priest-magistrate, on the bench in the Recorder's court?

"A daily paper publishes the following correction of an article which had appeared in its column: the previous day: 'Yesterday we gave the particulars of a fire which had occurred in the town of Barrie, mentioning the names and surnames of the victims. Having obtained further information we hasten to rectify certain inaccuracies in the report of the sad event. There were no victims, since the fire in question never took place. We may add that the town of Barrie does not exist.'—Motto per Ridere."

This story has a theological application. There was once a battle in Heaven, and one-third part of the inhabitants were banished to hell after the insurrection was crushed. That was the earlier bulletin from the scene of hostilities. "Having obtained further information" the ministers "hasten to rectify certain inaccuracies in the report of the sad event." Nobody was banished, since the rebellion in question "never took place." But most of the ministers have so far neglected to say: "We may add that the place called heaven does not exist." They will come to it, however, for they have already rectified the first dispatches, so far as hell, the other locality mentioned, is concerned.

In giving his opinion upon some Sunday closing cases, Judge Owers of Leadville said that all Sunday laws are a departure from the principle of home rule or local self-government. If this were all that the Colorado judge could say against such enactments it would not amount to much. Strictly speaking, that objection would apply only to national Sunday laws, for state laws are local in a legitimate sense, although, of course, not so narrowly so as municipal ordinances. Individual self-government is the real basis of the protest against Sunday legislation. Sunday laws are violative of religious liberty and prostrate the rights of the individual. In principle there is no difference between a national Sabbath law and a town ordinance having the same object in view, although practically the national law is the more dangerous because it is so much more difficult to get a bill of repeal through Congress than through a city council, and also because the national government is usually more remorseless in enforcing its laws than is the local government, and it is not so easy to boycott national as local tyrants.

The dailies of August 31st contained this heart-rending dispatch from Sullivan, Missouri:

"Three children of a widow named Jenkins while at play last evening went to a place near the barn to gather eggs. One child thrust its hand into what it supposed was the hen's nest, and quickly withdrew it, exclaiming that the hen had pecked its hand. The other two children put in their hands with the same result, and then set up a loud cry.

"The mother was at the well with the baby, and the alarm so excited her that she left the baby and ran to the assistance of the three children, who it seems had been bitten by a rattlesnake. During the excitement the little babe fell into the well and was drowned. The three other children died."

Will some honest believer in "Divine Providence" please tell us why this terrible "accident" was permitted? Can there be an "accident" with God? The most debased of men would have saved those children if he could. God could, but did not. Why? Was he too busy watching the fall of sparrows and enumerating hairs? Is it possible to believe that that unhappy mother had done aught that could merit such torture as the death of her four children in that awful way inflicted upon her? And who but a fiend would murder innocent children to punish their mother for any offense? He who reads the open book of the universe and still believes in a god of unlimited knowledge, power, and goodness is beyond the reach of reason.

The St. Louis Globe Democrat says that "it is intolerant, bigoted, and cruel to persecute and prosecute a sincere, earnest, and religious body of men and women, simply because they observe a day of rest which does not please the majority of people." Very true, but is it not equally intolerant, bigoted, and cruel to persecute and prosecute any number of men and women simply because they choose their own time for rest and work? This is what all Sunday laws do. On July 21st a Seventh-Day Adventist carpenter was arrested in Chicago for working on Sunday. When the case came to trial a nonsuit was entered, the police captain saying that they were after criminals, not honest workingmen. Good enough, so far as it goes, but is not this and every other police captain in that city enforcing the new barber-shop Sunday closing law which Governor Altgeld had the courage neither to sign nor to veto? Is not a barber an "honest workingman"? The Adventist was properly released, and never should have been arrested, but was he not released because he had a "religious" reason for observing another Sabbath than Sunday, and is not the law against Sunday work in barber shops enforced because the barbers can give no "religious" reason for working on that day? Have men, as men, no rights in the United States which preachers, brawling legislators, and cowardly governors are under obligations to respect?

It is commonly supposed by Christians that John, when on Patmos, saw heaven in a vision. But Talmage says that he looked through a telescope! Listen to this raving of a disordered mind:

"As we stand looking through the telescope of St. John, we see a blaze of amethyst, and pearl, and emerald, and sardonyx, and chrysoparous, and sapphire—a mountain of light, a cataract of color, a sea of glass, and a city like the sun.

"St. John bids us look again, and we see thrones: thrones of the prophets, thrones of the patriarchs, thrones of the angels, thrones of the apostles, thrones of the martyrs, throne of Jesus—throne of God. And we turn around to see the glory, and it is—Thrones! Thrones! Thrones!"

There is a whole sermon of this sort of stuff, and the New York Times prints it all, making two long columns in fine type. We don't know why the Times prints Talmage's sermons; it would seem that they are fit only for the syndicate sheets, while the Times is a paper with a good many pretensions to intelligence and a consequently proportionally small circulation. It may be that the sermons are intended to constitute the humorous department of the paper, but if that is the case it should be distinctly so stated, on the same principle that the country papers act when they put "Poetry" or "Poetical Department" over their original and selected verse. The little boy who wrote under the figure he had drawn on his slate the legend, "This Is a Horse," was more thoughtful than the editor of the Times. To prevent unnecessary wear and tear of thinkers, amateur art, cross-roads poetry, and pulpit humor should always be plainly labeled.

The mischievous notion that certain men, by reason of their vocation, are either too good or too bad to exercise the ordinary functions of citizens is quite prevalent in the South, where, as we have before had occasion to point out, the constitutions of some of the states forbid a minister to hold any civil office. In other words, the idea of equal citizenship is lost in that of class distinctions based on occupation. By a curious coincidence, the church is stronger in the South than elsewhere in the country, and laws against freedom on Sunday and discrimination against Infidels are more numerous and stringent, and generally more rigorously enforced. A disfranchised or disbarred class can dominate legislation in spite of its disabilities if it is accepted by the voters and law-makers as the teaching class. This is precisely the position that the clergy occupy. In view of this fact, the demand of the Press and Banner, of Abbeville, South Carolina, that the legislature "forever prevent any minister of the gospel from holding office or dabbling in politics" is foolish in the extreme. Such a law would vastly augment the influence of the clergy, for whatever savors of persecution redounds to the benefit of the persecuted. But there is a vital principle as well as a question of expediency involved in this proposition. The state can rightfully discriminate neither for nor against the church. If it debar clergy from office on the ground that they are too good to make and administer laws, it discriminates ostensibly in favor of the church. If it debar them on the ground that they are too bad, it discriminates ostensibly against the church. If it forbids them to take part in political discussions it denies free speech to a class because they are religious teachers. The state has nothing whatever to do with ministers as ministers; it can recognize them only as inhabitants of the state, subject to the same laws as and no other laws than those which regulate the relations of the other inhabitants.

"No executive officer has authority to repeal and hold void even the worst laws. The assumption of such authority by any executive officer should be made a felony, punishable by the severest penalties and by removal from office."—Judge Owers, of Colorado.

The appeal from the legislator to the executive is often the appeal from Philip drunk to Philip sober. They both stand as the representatives of the people and both have large discretion. Perhaps they should be held to the strict letter of their instructions, but the legislator rarely keeps within the limits of action prescribed for him by the Constitution, and his disobedience to orders necessitates, if the rights of minorities are not to be utterly wiped out, that the executive shall interpose his passive veto when the jurist fails to interpose his active veto by declaring the unconstitutional enactment null and void. That is the situation; it is not a question of "two wrongs not making one right," as some stickler for statism may be disposed to say; the legislator has transcended his powers and invaded the reserved rights of the citizens; the executive, by refusing to follow his lead and join in the unconstitutional aggression, simply stands by the original instructions. His offense is a technical one, a negative one, but by committing it he avoids the infinitely greater actual, positive offense of trampling the fundamental law of the state and the equities of social organization. Judge Owers talks quite bravely of removing and punishing passive executive officers, but it is very much a question whether he is prepared to follow his logic to the bitter end. Had he been an executive officer of anti-slavery views in the ante-bellum days, and had he been ordered to restore a trembling fugitive slave to his master, he might have obeyed, but the suspicion that he would have "lost" the fugitive somewhere will persist in intruding itself. Had he been an executive officer in the time of the Inquisition, and had his mother, convicted of witchcraft or heresy, been put into his hands for torture and death at the stake, he might have obeyed, but it would have been to escape a similar fate, not because of respect for the law or because he thought he ought to obey it.

"Doubtless there are laws and customs in Turkey in conflict with the moral laws of Christianity. The teachings of the Bible cannot but have, therefore, an influence that tells against the immoralities of the Turkish government. But this is not the fault either of the Bible or the missionaries who teach it. The same thing is true of our own country and in every other nation under the sun. The liquor traffic which our own government licenses, the desecration of the Sabbath by the United States mail service, the violation of the laws of Christian marriage by our loose and corrupt divorce legislation are in evidence on this point."—Christian Reformer.

Such appeals as this to Christian ignorance and prejudice are despicable. The Turkish government can triumphantly point to the Bible for ample justification for every crime of spoliation, invasive lust, and persecution of which its subjects have been guilty or can be guilty, and the Christian Reformer knows it, whatever may be the blissful ignorance of the mass of its readers. If there were no drinkers of intoxicants there would be no sellers of them; the Bible is the text-book of the drinker, and the Christian Reformer knows it, however successful it may be in keeping the truth from the knowledge of its subscribers. There is in the Bible no warrant whatever for the keeping of Sunday as the Sabbath; both Jesus and Paul explicitly condemned the enforced observance of any day as a Sabbath; Sunday was the old pagan festival day of the sun, a day of mirth and joy, officially grafted into Christianity by the edict of Constantine the Catholic, and centuries later made a day of gloom, penance, and persecution by Puritan and Covenanters. It is a Catholic holy day, resting on the authority of the church alone. All this the Christian Reformer knows, despite its contentions contrariwise, which are deliberate attempts to deceive the unread Christian laity. The Bible stands for polygamy, for the subjection of the wife to the husband, for the silence of the woman in the church, and for rape by wholesale at the command of God, and the Christian Reformer knows it, cant as it may about the "sanctity" of "Christian marriage." The theocratic propaganda is humbug and fraud from beginning to end, and the Christian Reformer knows it.

The New York Tribune has just struck a profitable lead. In a quietly humorous but altogether thought-provoking editorial in its issue of August 29th it points out that the stock targets of the popular caricaturists and newspaper paragraphers exist only in the fancy of their creators, as a rule. The décolleté bathing dress is rarely seen, "the fool farmer from Wayback, with goat-like beard and straw in mouth and hayseed in hair, exhibiting the intelligence of a compound cylinder, triple-screw idiot, is familiar to the professional fun-maker, but is a stranger to the census"; the "polysyllabic speech of Boston is heard only at the funny man's desk," and so on to the end of the list of paragraphistic butts. "They do not exist; or, if they do, only in remote exceptions which serve to prove the rule." Then the Tribune proceeds to inquire how much, if any, harm "such wholesale exaggerations and fabrications" do. An officer of a prominent college for women declared that such attacks had greatly injured that institution, and the Tribune has been informed that the "constant lampooning and caricaturing of farmers as clowns and gawks has operated to keep many young men from engaging in agriculture." The New York daily's conclusions are embodied in these sentences:

"Certainly it is an open question whether it would not be better for comic artists and paragraphers to sharpen their pens and pencils against the many real evils and undoubted follies of the world, rather than against foibles of their own devising."

There is one American caricaturist who does not fire his shafts against foibles of his own devising, but who directs them against "the real evils and undoubted follies of the world." That caricaturist is our artist, Watson Heston. He sharpens his pencil against superstition, hypocrisy, and tyranny, and every stroke is a blow for enlightenment, candor, and liberty. It would be well if there were many more like him in purpose, but it does not follow that there is no place for the others, for those who amuse without arousing. Life is not all work nor all battle, and there must be times of relaxation for wearied muscles and strained nerves. In art and in letters we need both the teacher and the amuser. Sage and clown have each a place that can not be filled by the other.

A few weeks ago we sent notices to those of our subscribers who were indebted to us on their subscription account, and we are glad to say that a great many of them kindly responded with promptness. There are many, however, from whom we have as yet had no word, and to them we address these appealing remarks. We want some money, and want it badly, else we wouldn't say anything about it. But the cost of getting out the paper has to be paid regularly, and it takes a good deal of cash. So we again ask those whose time has expired to make an effort to renew their subscriptions now—at once—right off—so we can have the wherewithal to pay some bills that are due. We owe some people, other people owe us. If other people will pay us, we can pay some people; and then everybody will be happy. (Quod erat demonstrandum.) It is very unpleasant to be short of funds with a great deal more owed us than we owe, but that is our fix now, and hence this reminder to those who forgot to respond to the notice. We dislike to mention this matter, but Necessity has no fellowship with Squeamishness, and we have to do it. We need the money.

News and Notes.

It was a beautiful day when our company left Paris. The city sank from view in lusters of light, and the variegated landscapes, with silver expanses of water, enlarge upon the view as the rapid locomotiv winds through the realms of Normandy. Once more the old and new town of Rouen advances and recedes, villages and farms appear, and Dieppe and the bright ocean put in a lovely appearance in charming association. Again we sweep by the lofty images of Jesus, into the tumbling billows that try to make us seasick with their musical motion, but don't succeed. Again the white cliffs of England edge the blue and dancing main, and in the soft expanse of the harbor we float safe and sound. From New Haven we wend our way somewhat slowly on the train to Brighton by the sea; and even after Paris Brighton does not pale its luster. Brighton is the largest watering-place in the world. It has 150,000 inhabitants, and I am sure there can be no more attractive place. Besides, it is the "pink of fashion." The aristocracy of England flutter here, but the common people also can have a good time. There is plenty of room on sea or shore. The ocean spreads far away, decked with many a sail, and the city, with its magnificent streets and massiv hills, fronts the imperious Neptune. There is variety, animation, business, and pleasure all around. There are boats, fishermen, the immense piers, the market-places on the beach, and the "machines." The bathing-houses, or "machines," are on wheels. You get into the machine, don your bathing-suit, and the machine is then trundled out into the tide, and you can jump in from the machine itself, without the trouble of walking. They are so wonderfully "moral" here in Brighton and elsewhere at English seaside resorts that the men and women bathe separately, even as they used to sit on opposite sides of the church. Perhaps bathing is still considered a religious ceremony in England, and hence, according to orthodox ideas, the sexes must keep apart. In France, as in our own country, men and women bathe together, even as they eat and drink together. And I understand that in England this common-sense custom is beginning to prevail, and the old pharisaical nonsense is disappearing.

On Thursday, by the kindness of Mr. George Ward, who is mine host on this occasion, with Mrs. Ward and Miss Robbins, we take a drive to the "Devil's Dyke." This is about four miles from Brighton, and is a wonderful spot. The devil undertook a big job here once on a time—to scoop out the earth and make a dyke or canal by which, the ocean could sweep in upon the interior country and so create a vast inland sea; but after digging an immense basin, some saint or angel stopped the devil in his nefarious undertaking, and he was compelled to surrender his shovel, and even his ghost, for the grave of the devil himself is pointed out. There is a cable road over this stupendous chasm, and we swung across it in merry fashion. It was a dizzying ride. We could peer down into the depths of the enormous dyke, 235 feet; and it certainly made one feel that if he did tumble in, he would surely see innumerable stars and Lucifer himself. But the cable held us in its wave-like motion, and our lofty voyage to and fro was completed in safety.

The view from the top of the dyke is one of the most extensive and magnificent in England. From a circle of massiv hills the cultivated lands, adorned with villages and dwellings, stretch away for fifty miles. On clear days one can see as far off as the Crystal Palace and Windsor Castle, fifty miles distant. We seem to be standing on a lofty cliff, and like a sea itself the glittering expanses roll away.

From the Devil's Dyke we direct our course to the crowded race-track. It is a gala day; vast numbers of people are in attendance, and all sorts of shows attract the view. The supreme delight, of course, is the galloping horses. I think this is the finest race-course in the world. It is not level, but is built upon vast hills, and for two miles you can behold the steeds flying along, and watch them as they thunder to the goal. It is a grand and beautiful sight, and wild is the enthusiasm of the multitude as the splendid coursers bound forward neck to neck. They do not have, I understand, trotting races in this country, as in America; it is the running race—the gallop. So far as trotters are concerned, America takes the lead. The English put their skill almost altogether into the running horse. It strikes me, therefore, that America surpasses England in the skill of horsemanship, and has evolved a finer type of this magnificent animal.

Friday morning I visit George Jacob Holyoake, the philosopher and the philanthropist, who has made Brighton his home for the last twenty years.

It was a delight to behold his books and pictures and the serene abode where he passes his youthful old age. He has a portrait of Thomas Paine, upon the back of which is the autograph of Paine himself; also a portrait of Richard Carlile, who reminds one of Ingersoll in the breadth and nobility of his features, and the face of Ingersoll also greets us, and that of Mazzini, Garibaldi, Orsini, Harriet Martineau, George Henry Lewes, Herbert Spencer, friends and companions in reform with Holyoake, showing the comprehensiveness of his labors. The aroma of revolutionary thought is about us, together with the dreams and hopes of a reconstructed humanity. There was also a small bust of Voltaire, made in the lifetime of Voltaire, I understand, and certainly its eyes and lips, more than any picture I have seen, convey the wonderfully smiling satire of the immortal iconoclast. It shows that deep in the heart of Voltaire, back of all his biting jests, was a sweet and sunny spirit of humanity.

Mr. Holyoake presented me with his own book, "Sixty Years of an Agitator's Life." I shall certainly prize this book because of the giver and his generous appreciation, and also because of the charming and unique panorama it gives of English life and progress for over half a century. Mr. Holyoake writes from his own point of view, and certainly he has been in the midst of vast and varied scenes; he makes one acquainted with the many heroes and martyrs of our cause, and he infuses into his own narrative both a philosophic and poetic spirit. Mr. Holyoake, in his early youth, did write poetry—even religious poetry; but while the form of poetry has passed away, still the poetic imagination remains and colors his keen philosophy without disturbing the sharp line of truth, giving a picturequeness and rhythm to his language which makes his history possess the fascination of a romance of real life. Mr. Holyoake is no optimist, but he has the faculty of making one see the good things of this human earthly life. In the midst of the vast conflict he does not forget the flowers that bloom nor the stars that shine.

Our good comrade, Arthur B. Moss, and his two boys, were with us on this occasion, and it was a pleasure to thus briefly meet in the passing holidays, to forget awhile the stress of war, and enjoy the universe like a child at play. Mr. Moss is doing some popular work in the drama, and has made quite a hit with some excellent productions which are vital with the spirit of modern progress. After a drive along the bright shores to Rottingdean and return, with the boundless, glittering sea on one side, and the splendid city and the shining hills on the other, and a call upon our stalwart friend, Mr. Tripp, who has done so much for Freethought in this orthodox community where fashion reigns—and of course fashion precludes almost any kind of thought—we take our departure for London, glad to have had a view of Brighton, one of the representative cities of the old world. Amidst its wealth and elegance we find real human nature, the glory of the outward world blooming into the wide, free play of intellect and heart.

Of course I drift to Johnson's Court while in London, to the realms of the Freethinker, which, though not palatial, are always illuminated, and thence to Gatti's, for we reformers believe that a healthful mind should be in a healthful body, and what conduces more to a healthful body than a fine English beefsteak and its accompaniments of merry speech and philosophic disquisition? I am always in favor of a good square meal. We thus lay the foundations of mental courage and strenuous thought.

Saturday afternoon I take the express for Manchester. Although the sun is shining brightly when I start, one of the biggest storms of the season pours down its cataracts when I arrive. Mr. Westwell meets me, and we plunge through the rainy columns to his home, eight miles out. But a pleasant fireside awaits me, a jolly supper, and the wine that cheereth God and man, and we find rest after the tumultuous conflict. Sunday morning dawns with changing skies, now dark, now blue, and between spells I find my way to Failsworth. It is the anniversary of the Failsworth Secular Sunday-school, and, notwithstanding the stormful weather, large audiences are present, men, women, and children, and we have a festival-time indeed, "with a heart for any fate." The Failsworth Secular Sunday-school is a singular institution. It is an evolution that is of remarkable interest. It began over fifty years ago, with somewhat obscure elements, the history of which it is difficult to trace. The property was, originally, I understand, in the hands of the church. Then, by some legal process, it drifted into the possession of the Secular party. The property, at that time, was not considered valuable, and its possibilities were not regarded. Finally, the orthodox party awoke to the fact that the property was useful, and made a desperate effort to regain control, and actually did get control of the lower part of the building, while the Secular party triumphantly entrenched themselves in the upper part. The Secular party were not to be caught napping; they had their sentinels out day and night, and once on a time, when the orthodox forces quitted the ground floor, trusting, I suppose, in the providence of God, the Secular party secured possession, locked the door, and kept the orthodox picket-line out in the cold. Resort was then had to the courts, and the legal right of the Secular party to the property was there maintained, and ever since Secularism has held peaceable possession. The Secular school was started and has become a flourishing institution. It is a recognized establishment, and in all town celebrations has its place and its banner with the other schools. It is no longer ostracized. Even the orthodox are rather proud to have such a school in their midst as a representative of universal humanity. There is nothing succeeds like success, as the French say, and when a Secular school does succeed, when it is on a firm foundation, why, then, the churches are ready to do it honor. It is a fact that orthodoxy is always ready to welcome the victor. The greatest heresy is defeat.

The Failsworth Secular Sunday-school is a success, deep-rooted and far-reaching. The youthful element is continually flowing into it. As the old depart, the new take their place with fresh enthusiasm. The evolution broadens and strengthens with time. Although vigorous personalities have no doubt contributed to its advance, yet it does not depend upon any one individual for its growth, but upon humanity at large, and the permanent elements that are in it. It shows that Secular education is profoundly adapted to the real nature of the child, much more so than any religious training. A Secular school can be as attractive in art, in music, in flowers, in beautiful and poetic accompaniments, as a religious school, while, at the same time, it teaches science, common sense, and real duties without the dogmatism and superstition of theology. I look upon the Failsworth Secular School, not only as an accomplishment, but as a prophecy of noble and splendid things to come on the basis of simple humanity, free from the vague and puzzling ideas of God.

There are two choirs connected with the school, a choir of little children, and one of older pupils, also an orchestra of young men. Besides the regular Sunday services, they have, during the season, musical and dramatic entertainments, festival gatherings, etc., and there is no dependence on any outside help. There is sufficient talent in the school itself. The services began on Sunday afternoon at half-past two. First there was an overture by the band; then a hymn sung by the choir; then the "Children's Hymn," and then the address, and afterwards music by the band and choir; the same order of exercises being observed in the evening. The audience room was filled; on the platform were the singers; there was a large display of flowers, and the walls were ornamented with pictures and wreaths. It was in every respect a delightful service. Mr. Henry Taylor presided in the afternoon, and Mr. Gimson of Leicester in the evening. Mr. Alfred Warren is leader of the orchestra, and Mr. Thomas Anderton of the choir. Mr. Wm. Jones is president of the school; Mr. E. Howard, secretary. The American visitor was warmly welcomed and had appreciative listeners. He spoke on "The Bible and Modern Thought" and on "Freethought and Morality." The little children were good hearers, too. In their bright faces and in the beautiful surroundings of this auspicious service one might see the glory of the future, the full and happy days to come, when over the path of infancy shall float no cloud of superstition; when no dark and savage fear shall enthrall, but the sunshine and flowers, the voices of love and truth, shall charm the innocent way. What beautiful hope there is in the music of childhood! There is the true heaven of our advancing age, in the ever-shining dawns of happy births.

It was my privilege on this occasion to name the little child of Mr. Joseph Clough and Mrs. Sarah Jane Clough. The name enrolled on the banners of Freethought is Henry Clough, and I have no doubt it will be a bright and honorable name in the annals of our cause.

I must record my meeting with John Haigh, the brother of Joseph Haigh, well known in our American ranks. John walked in five miles to hear me speak and to give me a good hearty English welcome, and I have no doubt he is just as earnest in the cause as Joseph himself. In the pages of THE TRUTH SEEKER they can shake hands across the Atlantic.

I must also acknowledge the gift of a beautiful bouquet of flowers from Mrs. Howard—a happy omen for future work. I enjoyed the hospitality of Mr. and Mrs. William Jones. After the services we had a pleasant sociable gathering at Mr. Jones's, with music and recitations, closing an eventful day with the cheer of good fellowship.

Fairworth has a population of about 15,000. It adjoins Manchester, and is a manufacturing point. The people have lived here from generations back, and it is said that almost all are related to one another, so that it is like one great family. The stability and neighborliness of the people account perhaps for the growth of the school and the absence of bitter sectarianism. Members of the same family divide up, some to the Secular school, some to the Wesleyan, but there is no ill-feeling. The ties of relationship overcome the discords of religion, and fraternity prevails.

I shall always have a happy remembrance of Fairworth. It is one of the "day-stars" of the Secular movement. It shows what Secularism is capable of achieving; that it is not a theory but a practical power. It is comprehensive, and meets the wants of humanity in all conditions, except those of fear and ignorance.

Monday morning, by the kindness of Mr. Wm. Hilton and his son, Mr. Thomas Wm. Hilton, I visit the great shops of Platt Brothers and Company at Oldham. Oldham joins Fairworth, and has a population of 160,000. It is an active place. It has 12,000,000 spindles in operation. It is one of the leading centers of cotton industry. It has but little ancient history, but its modern development is wonderful. In the middle of the last century there were but sixty buildings all told in Oldham. Besides the cotton industry, there is the working of the coal-mines, which abound in the vicinity. There is not much beauty about Oldham. It is all for business. The coal-mines give a griminess to the landscape, which does not suggest Arcadian felicity. Huge piles of factories, tall chimneys, busy machineries, are what make up the picture of Oldham.

Among the foremost industrial temples of Oldham are the renowned factories of the Platt Brothers. I think they beat the world. The buildings altogether cover a space of 55 acres; 11,000 men are employed. I stand at the entrance and watch this vast army of workers as they come trooping in. It sets one's imagination at work, thinking of the colossal power in the hands of these regiments of toilers, and I wonder will this army be a triumphant army, or will it eventually be an army of slaves, no better than the machineries they manufacture. There is strength, there is intelligence, there is will in this mighty force. In it are the fibers of humanity; and if it is crushed, civilization will cease to be. I could not but feel the thrill of hope as this great stream of powerful men went sweeping by. It was more than an army with banners.

The Platt Brothers are manufacturers of every description of machinery for preparing, combing, spinning, and weaving cotton, wool, and worsted on a scale of magnitude unequalled. The manner in which this work is carried on, the efficiency of every resource, the toil of thousands, the vastness of the capital invested, the splendid organization which exists, make this industrial palace of unique importance. Its trade extends to every country. It is now filling an order of 42,000 spindles for Fall River, Mass. The annual consumption of fuel is 36,000 tons of coal and 12,000 tons of coke. Of material, 36,000 tons of iron and 325,000 cubic feet of timber are used each year. As I wandered through these vast regions of toil, manifold in aspect, watching the beginning, process, and completion of the superb machinery, I was deeply impressed with the magnificence of human genius, for it seems to endow the machine itself with thought, to give it subtlety, wisdom, energy, the gift, almost, of selection, as it moves on its brilliant and unerring course. One might pass hours in these extensive areas, and still see new exhibitions of skill and industrial power. There is something entrancing in the "world of magic" created by the incessant hands of labor. The lurid workshops might remind one of Milton's picture of hell, but out of their depths what a glorious paradise arises, such as all the gods have never been able to create.

Call for the Annual Congress.

NEW YORK, OCTOBER 25TH, 26TH, AND 27TH.

To the Liberals of America, Members of the Freethought Federation and Secular Union, and all Societies organized for the Purpose of maintaining a purely Secular Government:

It is of great importance that Freethinkers should combine. It is of more importance now than at any previous period, for there is more work to do and the work cannot be done by isolated effort. There are vast ecclesiastical combinations organized for the express purpose of overthrowing Freethought, and also of uniting church and state in a more dangerous form than ever before. These questions immediately confront us:

The Taxation of Church Property,
The Bible in the Public Schools,
The Sabbath Laws, and
The Liberty of the Press.

Property to the value of a billion of dollars is exempt from taxation in the American Republic, in many places religious exercises in the public schools are on the increase, and the very foundation of universal education is being destroyed. The conflict in regard to Sabbath laws is now waged both in the states and in the national Congress, and a centralized political power is being established for the purpose of aggrandizing the authority of the church in civil matters; and honest Freethinkers are imprisoned to-day for discussing questions of the utmost importance to human improvement. Against these flagrant and ever accumulating acts of injustice we must unitedly contend. Freethinkers throughout the Union, in every state, county, city, and village, should be in active communication, and ready to meet at any point the encroachments of the church. It is often the case that a Freethinker is alone in his community in the open support of Liberal thought and principles, and for this reason suffers persecutions. Religious bigots assume that they can trample upon the Freethinker's rights with impunity on account of their own vast majority.

When it is well understood that the Freethinkers of this country are joined together and will defend one another at all hazards, the rights of Freethought will be respected and the individual Freethinker will have the power of numbers to support his cause. The theologian is naturally a coward. He persecutes only the minority. He does not trust in God unless God has a big majority. When the theologian realizes that the Freethinker is not a solitary unit, but the representative of a great force, he will not only cease his persecutions, but even welcome him to social equality. A theologian is very considerate towards a powerful party, however much he despises the humble citizen.

There is a great contest before us. We must be an organized party or submit to defeat and ostracism. We cannot fold our hands and do nothing. We must become an intellectual, social, moral, and political power through a generous and permanent comradeship. We can do this only by public meetings, congresses, associations, and a Freethought press. We must use the same instrumentalities that are constantly used by the churches. They have their great gatherings, their synods, their councils, their conventions, and in this way the churches create an immense enthusiasm and exercise a more potent sway. These are human, practical, and far-reaching means, and Freethought must avail itself of such necessary aids.

All, therefore, are urged to come together at the National Congress of the American Secular Union and the Freethought Federation of America, to be held in New York, October 25th, 26th, and 27th, 1895.

It is hoped that there will be a large attendance, and that measures of co-operation, greater advance and usefulness will be adopted and cordially carried out by all the friends of freedom throughout the country.

The members of the American Secular Union are notified that such amendments to the Constitution will be proposed at the coming Congress as will enable the Union to consolidate with the Freethought Federation of America.

The members of the Freethought Federation are also notified that changes of the same nature will be proposed for its Constitution in order that it may unite as an organized body with the American Secular Union.

It is the general desire that there be one grand national organization adapted to all the needs of the present and future work. Without doubt this will be determined in a wise, conciliatory, and progressive spirit. Let us close our ranks and meet the common enemy, the bigots of the Christian church. We work for the future; we work for humanity; we work for the best interests of civilization, for the liberty and the progress of all. Let us stand bravely by our colors and unite in the common cause. There are vast and profound principles which should harmonize superficial differences. We have no creed to support, but always and everywhere the rights of man. This is the mighty battleground. Let us rally now as never before, with earnest convictions, courage, and enthusiasm. We cannot evade the issue, neither can the church itself. It is liberty or it is slavery. This is the conflict of the ages, and in the American Republic all that is most precious and ennobling is at stake.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM, President.

Freethought Abroad.

According to the French Freethought Annual for 1894 France is divided into 86 political departments. Of these 81 contain one or more Freethought societies. Paris has 42 societies; the department of Seine, 35; 4 departments have 20 to 30 societies each—a total of 101 societies; 15 departments have 10 to 20 each, the others less than 10 each—total number of societies in France, 234. Besides these the Federation has 250 individual members, whose yearly contribution amounts in all to 1,250 francs. The Federation owns its own building, No. 7 Rue de Ecauffes, Paris. During the past year the additions numbered 21 societies and 43 individual members, making a total of 258 societies and 402 individuals. Four provincial congresses and a large number of minor celebrations were held during the same period. The financial report for the last year is as follows: The "Penny fund" (Denier) receipts, fr. 935.35; expenditures of same (propaganda) fr. 717.90; the building fund receipts, fr. 3,135.80; expenditures, fr. 2,532.60; the Federation income receipts, fr. 4,097.15; expenditures, fr. 3,774.05; leaving a surplus for the year of fr. 1,644.20, which is a very good financial showing. Of the 25 members elected to the "Central Council," E. Pasquier received the greatest number of votes, viz., 83; Amline the fewest, viz., 61. The "Commission of Control," 5 members, Bévalet received 57, Soubsal, 52 votes.

A new crematory has been opened at Apolda, Sachsen-Weimar. This makes 4 ovens for the German empire. . . . The annual congress of the German Freethought Federation was held during the month of May at Munich, Bavaria. . . . Der Freidenker, Cologne, compliments THE TRUTH SEEKER highly on its spirit of propagandism. It mentions particularly the pamphlet on "Church Property" and a distribution for a nominal price of Paine's "Age of Reason." . . . Dr. Bruno Wille (portrait and biography in "Four Hundred Years of Freethought"), editor of Der Freidenker, labor, invites such of his readers as can translate English, and wish to do so for his paper, to inform him, and he will supply them with numbers of THE TRUTH SEEKER. . . . A brilliant lecture by Dr. Voelkel, Part III. of "Shall the Children of Dissenters be Compelled to Take Part in the Common School Teaching?" has been published. It deals with the women of the Bible. This brilliant coterie of ancient female worthies is shown in their true light, which is very different from that produced by the most Christian theologians. Sixty-six pages. . . . The Free Religious Society of Berlin, Germany, held its silver jubilee March 24th.

Religion a Matter of Geography.

Assuming that the supposed discovery that General Grant and Jefferson Davis had the same great-grandfather is true, a writer in the New York Times remarks that it would be curious, if possible, "to discover how and why the Revolutionary spirit of William Simpson, transmitted through a son on the one side and a daughter on the other, took such strangely different directions and came together at last in a deadly conflict in which the grandson of John Simpson defeated the grandson of Ann Simpson." The Hartford Times says: "There seems to be nothing strange about it. The two men grew up in communities that were subsequently arrayed against each other, and each looked at things in the light of his association and environment, just as a man in Spain is likely to be a Roman Catholic, in England a Protestant, and in China a Buddhist."

The new magistrates are now holding under heavy bail men inculpated for selling beer on Sunday, but men charged with selling adulterated milk they do not hold at all. Why? Hard to say. Beer is what the people want; adulterated milk is what they do not want. Perhaps the essence of crime is the old Puritanical one that it is wicked to give the people what they want.—New York Morning Journal.

Why Jesus Was Crucified.

It was not for his religious teachings but for his alleged political agitation that Jesus suffered death on the cross at the hands of the Romans, says the Literary Digest. Such is the contention of a prominent Jewish rabbi in Germany in a new book entitled "Jesus of Nazareth." Dr. Hamburger, the author, is "Oberlandes-Rabbiner"—that is to say, he holds rank under the Prussian government somewhat similar to that of a bishop. This Jewish theologian denies that Jesus fell a victim to his opposition to the religious doctrine of the priesthood of his times. Jesus, he thinks, was crucified, like others before and after him, because Caiaphas regarded him as a political agitator only, and likely to lead the discontented masses in open rebellion against their Roman masters. Once in the hands of the Romans, the life of Jesus could not be saved any more than that of the "messiahs" Judas and Theudas, who were executed shortly before Jesus (Acts v, 36, 37). That the people of Jerusalem received Jesus with joy was sufficient to reuse the Romans, who were wont to crucify the Jews by hundreds and thousands if they removed the votive tablets and statues of the emperors. A review of the book appears in the Nation, Berlin. Speaking of the blasphemy which Jesus is said to have committed—from a Jewish point of view—according to St. Matthew, St. Mark, and St. Luke, the author says:

"It would have been impossible to sentence the Christ to death on such grounds. According to Talmudic law, the only blasphemy punishable by death consisted in uttering Jehovah's name with an accompaniment of curses, i.e., cursing the almighty (Mishner Sanhedrin vii, 5). But Jesus is not accused of having done this. If Jesus called himself God, and this was misunderstood, he nevertheless could not be punished for it, as the mortal nature of all men is so evident that it is not necessary to find punishment for one who calls himself divine (Sanhedrin S. 61 b). Besides, Christ recites the Jewish articles of faith, recognizes God as his god and the god of his ancestors, and this alone would have been sufficient to free him from the accusation of having called himself God or God's son in an anti-Jewish sense (Mark xii, 29, 30). The charge of blasphemy could not possibly be proved against him, and the traditional account of his trial does not agree with the requirements of the Talmudic code. A charge of blasphemy could be preferred only before a full conclave of the Sanhedrin, which numbered seventy-two members and formed the highest court in all secular and religious disputes (Gemara Sanhedrin S. 61 b). The case could be heard only in the temple and in the daytime (152, Rashi Sanhedrin S. 41 a), could lead to a conviction and sentence only on the following day (Mishna Sanhedrin iv, 1; Gemara Sanhedrin 32), and the verdict could not be published before three days more had passed to allow time for the defense. But even if the sin of blasphemy had been committed, no sentence could be pronounced, and, more than that, no charge could be preferred against the accused, unless the witnesses deposed under oath that the accused persisted in his blasphemy after having been warned three times. The Jews extended this last clause to all other capital crimes, and this led to a practical exclusion of death sentences, especially as the sentence had to be executed by the witnesses. In conclusion it must be mentioned that nobody could be sentenced upon his own assertions, as the Jewish law allowed for suicidal intentions and melancholia (Maimonides Sanhedrin xviii, 6). All the requirements of the case as cited here are wanting in the Evangelical accounts. The account given in the gospel according to St. Matthew therefore clashes with all Jewish law as well as with the gospel of St. John, which declares that Caiaphas demanded the death of Christ, not because he deserved death, but because a prophecy had to be fulfilled.

"Nor could the account given in the gospels come from persons who were present, if a proper, legal Jewish proceeding took place, as is claimed in the gospels. The judges did not sit in open court in determining upon such cases of blasphemy, being desirous to prevent a public repetition of that blasphemy. The accused had to make his statements before the lawyers ere he was confronted with the tribunal (Tosephta Sanhedrin x, 11).

"How difficult it was to obtain even a much lighter punishment for dissenting opinions on the subject of religion is shown in Acts v, 34-40, where Rabbi Gamaliel defends the followers of Christ. This liberality was not unusual or exceptional; it only agreed with the perfect freedom of speech and freedom to teach guaranteed by the Talmud. Dissenting preachers were too common to excite much remark. It was only when Jesus acted against the rules laid down by the Sanhedrin that he could be punished; as he only accused it of neglect of duty he went free. Cause against him was found in his driving the traders and money-changers from the temple."

Observations.

The fact to which attention is called by Rabbi Hamburger, that under the Jewish law Christ could not have been put to death for preaching himself crucified, leaves the story of the cross in almost as doubtful a shape as the yarn about the tongue-paralyzed Infidel of High Shoals, Ga. But the ignorance of the gospel fabricators who represent Jesus as having been crucified for an act that was not punishable in that way, is advanced enlightenment compared with the blindness of the Christian world which accepts the death of the Galilean agitator and martyr as a sacrifice or as an atonement. Sacrifices and atonements, as anyone can see by reading Leviticus, where the law governing such rites is laid down, must be offered under certain specified conditions in order to take effect or to have any orthodox meaning. For example, they must be made voluntarily by the person expecting to profit by them. There is nothing to show that one man could steal another man's sheep, and, having slaughtered it, set it out on his table, in the regular course of housekeeping, as an atonement for the sins of the owner. He must take his own mutton and offer it on the altar of his religion presided over by one or more priests. Otherwise it is no more a sacrifice than a bath is a baptism. In order that Christ might be an atonement he should have been taken to the temple by his disciples, the priests called in, and the immolation performed with due Levitical ceremony. Instead of this, he was arrested by the secular authorities as a rioter, and put to death as a criminal; and if any priest of God appeared, it was to denounce a malefactor and not to bless a sacrifice. A public execution is not a religious rite, and has no more theological significance as related to a sin or trespass offering than a free lunch has as compared with a communion service.

As D. M. Bennett was wont to remark, Christianity is full of errors.

The Prohibitionists of this state held an ecclesiastical council at Saratoga last week. For political purposes the gathering was called a convention. After prayer, and an exhortation by a clergyman to enter "a campaign for the Lord God Almighty," the council proceeded to formulate its confession of faith, otherwise its "platform." Trusting in the "power of Almighty God," the Prohibition party of the state of New York affirmed that "this is a Christian nation," that "a Christian citizen's ballot is his testimony and witness," and that an acceptance of the church's dictum as to prohibition shall be the test of a candidate's fitness for office. The Rev. Funk explained that "the Prohibition party stands for political sanctification," while that winged and articulate ass, the Hon. John G. Woolley of Chicago, called upon "all Christian men that they stand by the church and make her resolutions good in the politics of the land." Three thousand people with uplifted hands vowed to vote for no candidate who did not stand upon a platform in full and positive harmony with the official utterances of their respective churches with regard to the liquor traffic. Sabbath laws were indorsed on the "rest" pretext, and, by a shameless theft of Republican political capital, a telegram was sent to the police commissioners of this city, congratulating them on their enforcement of the Sunday statutes. It was not forgotten to chuck in a few sociological conceits to catch the votes of those who worship at the shrine of statute law, and who, in the face of universal experience, maintain an abiding faith in acts of the legislature.

In choosing a party emblem or gonfalon, the council overlooked the appropriateness of a bladder, either inflated or distended, and adopted a fountain—presumably the one that is filled with blood.

At the convention of the New York Populists at Syracuse, August 30th, when Mr. Thaddeus Burr Wakeman was nominated for secretary of state, a measure of considerable moment was proposed for submission to the people. This is it:

That all laws should be enforced by public officers or the police responsible to and paid by the people only, and we favor the suppression of the "Pinkertons," "White-caps," "mob laws," "lynchings," Gerry "societies," or "agents" for the suppression of Vice or crime under the support and employment of individuals or societies, whether incorporated or not, and insist that any useful public duties or functions now performed by them be returned to the people or to officers paid by and directly responsible to the people.

The authorship of this measure is as unmistakable as that of the Declaration of Independence. It is Wakeman's, and he is perhaps the only person at the convention who knew it was aimed at Anthony Comstock. Possibly the locality where Mr. Wakeman found himself recalled the old fight, for it was at Syracuse that the National Liberal League committed its life, fortune, and sacred honor to a similar proposition.

A strange thing happened at this Populist convention—no less than the proposal by a Freethinker, Mr. David Rousseau, that the next convention of the party be held in conjunction with the Prohibitionists, and a motion to appoint a conferring committee to effect such union was carried. Have the unorthodox Populists forgotten that the National Reform or God-in-the-Constitution party and the American Sabbath Union both hold conventions next year; that both these religious organizations have claims upon the co-operation of Secularists equal to those of the Prohibition party, and that both, like it, are fishing for gudgeons?

When an observatory was erected on Mt. Adams, Cincinnati, President John Quincy Adams, who was a Unitarian and after whom the observatory was presumably named, prophesied that the structure would be "a beacon of true science that should never be obscured by the dark shadows of superstition and intolerance symbolized by the popish cross." The world is now notified by a Catholic paper, the Review, that Mr. Adams's prophecy "was long ago proved false." For many years the observatory has been occupied by the Passionist Fathers, a religious order which practices celibacy and kindred indecencies, and on August 25th a new Catholic church was dedicated on the same eminence. Thus, as the Catholic Review admits, "the beacon of true science" has been "observed by the dark shadows of superstition and intolerance symbolized by the popish cross." President Adams, though a patriotic American, was a poor Christian and a worse prophet. The A. P. A. may count him one of its patron saints.

Members of the Liquor Dealers' Association, who a few weeks ago were denouncing the "odious spy system" and demanding the right to sell intoxicants on Sunday on grounds of "personal liberty," have surrendered to the police, adopted the odious spy system themselves, and profess to be assisting the authorities to detect violations of the law by dealers who do not belong to the association. The state of mind thus revealed by the publicans explains the largely increased church attendance since the saloons were closed. The "rummies," as the courteous Voice terms its political opponents, are good Christians after all, and that, again, explains their inability to perceive that personal liberty means liberty for others as well as themselves. So many people are developing this defect of late that it is hard to say whether, should a universal test arise, Liberty would be found to have any friends at all except the plumbline Freethinkers, whose name is not legion.

I see that we—that is, the United States—are going to send a commission to China to investigate the attacks on the American missionaries at Cheng Tu and its vicinity. This is the proper thing to do. Outrages on American citizens abroad are intolerable. It is only at home that such things can be permitted. If Moses Harman or J. B. Wise or the Adventists of Tennessee had been outraged for alleged offenses against some foreign power, all the jingoes in the United States would be drilling, or at least advising other citizens to drill—for the jingo himself is under suspicion of being a summer soldier. The papers of last week contained an account of the mobbing and stoning of Chinese boys in Greenpoint, Long Island; and a statistician publishes the fact that since last March one hundred and four persons, many of them women and some of them innocent, have been lynched in this country. Let us rally round the flag, boys, and maintain its honor abroad. Its support at home is becoming decidedly rocky.

It was in Ohio that a godly wife set fire to the bed of her irreligious husband in order to stimulate him to acts of worship, and I took occasion at the time to point out how wifely devotion was both stimulated and made tenderer by the gospel of Jesus Christ. Another case illustrating the influence of the same divine power has occurred hereaways. We are keeping up with the procession. In the police court Mrs. Annie Ulrich accused her husband of trying on several occasions to kill his family, because its members did not pray often enough to satisfy him. Ulrich himself was there, and said: "That's right. I'm a good Christian myself, and I pray before and after my meals, and also before I go to bed and after I get up. I have tried to raise my children in the same way, but my wife has let them play pinochle before and after meals and before they go to bed. She won't make them pray."

The justice deemed him too sincere a Christian to be at large, and held him in $500 bail.

Our Supreme Court has held that this is a Christian nation and that our laws are founded on the Mosaic code. It would therefore be interesting to know where this upstart of a police justice gets his authority for preventing Mr. Ulrich from sacrificing his children, his wife, or any of her relations who neglect the means of grace.

That froward wight, Algernon Charles Swinburne, is a possible successor to Alfred Lord Tennyson as English poet laureate. If so laureled, it will be Mr. Swinburne's function to celebrate in rhyme all births, deaths, and so forth, in the royal family of Great Britain. As the queen is getting well along in years, it is evident that a hand will soon have to be hired to sing her dirge, and Swinburne is good at dirges. It is Herbert Spencer who observes that "among the Foolahs in Africa there is a set of people called singing men, who travel about the country singing the praises of those who wish to purchase renown." The survival of the custom in some civilized countries shows that the Foolahs are not all dead.

A Vision Veiled.

[The publication some weeks since in THE TRUTH SEEKER of that exquisite nature poem, "When in the Night We Wake and Hear the Rain," together with some prefatory words of appreciation, have been the fortunate means of placing in our hands another poem of the same character, which we are sure our readers will put into their scrapbooks beside "Thanatopsis" and "When in the Night We Wake and Hear the Rain." In none of them is there a single trace of superstition, and the melody is flowing and beautiful. We have so little poetry that is free from theological allusion and delusion that we should give a generous welcome to such productions as "A Vision Veiled." Bryant wrote "Thanatopsis" when in his nineteenth year, he lived to a ripe old age, and occupies a proud position in the galaxy of American men of letters. The author of "A Vision Veiled" if as old, was no older, when he penned the lines given below than was Bryant when his world-famous poem was produced, and we hope a like illustrious career is before him. We make this statement regarding his age on the authority of an excellent photograph which now lies on our desk, and which reveals an exceptionally intellectual, keen, refined, and withal well-balanced organization.—Ed. T. S.]

Spring comes apace; the sluggish pulse of Time
Quickens with warm vibration, and the void
Of atmosphere profound expands with life,
And breathes the silent mystery of birth
Through all the cells of being. In the breasts
Of rugged trees that stand against the storm,
Tall, grim, defiant, stirs a stranger spell
Than ever threatening thunderbolts could rouse
Or wild winds wake—the impetuous vital sap,
Fresh from innumerable secret springs,
Trembles and thrills to every tenderest tip
Of every tiniest twig. The beaten clod
Beneath the feet swells into bursting bud,
Green blade, and glorious blossom. All the hills
But yesterday were white with drifted snow,
And now are white with pale anemones,
Purple with violets, and rich with all
The rainbow colors of the insect's wing
That make up beauty. Yonder smiling stream—
A thread of silver, winding fold on fold
In bright embroidery down the sunlit slopes
And shadowy levels; flapping in the light;
Chasing the gloom through all the leafless woods
That once were Summer's refuge from the noon
Of her own vaulted season—wanders on,
Now choked with trembling cresses, now above
The shining gravel chequering all its course
With crystal shallows; weaving evermore
A mystic measure for the tuneful tread,
And murmuring in the ear a nameless song.

So to the soul of man the voice of Spring
Speaks with sweet accents, and the mighty heart
Of Nature beats against his frozen breast,
And warms it to her music. Hand in hand
She leads him forth through all her affluent realms
And chooses for him, half against his will,
The choicest blossom and the fairest fruit.
There builds the bird, and frames his loveliest lay,
Rich with luxuriant cadences that sweep
The lyre of passion to its utmost strings,
For one sweet ear alone. Is not for him
In the wide world a happiness like this?
He loves, and she is beautiful, even she Whom he has passed unnoticed in the throng
Of youths and maidens on his native green
A hundred times before that wondrous day
Of transformation. Of the years to come,
The clouds that fret the prospect, and the view
Of distant hills that darken as he looks,
He takes no thought—the one of all the world
Is by his side, her breath upon his cheek,
And love is all a vision veiled with light,
And life a splendor and a dim surprise.

So when Ambition, like a troubled dream,
Pride like a passing pageant, wealth and power,
Like the swift meteors flashing through the night,
Fade into chill oblivion, and there steals
Over his tired soul that breathless sleep
Which men name vaguely, with averted gaze
And awed resolve—if even then his lips,
Pale as the ashes of extinguished fires,
Murmur, however faintly, "I have lived
To love and to be loved!" let no hand write
The sad word Failure on his wasted brow.

FREDERICK A. EATON.

The Devil Appears in a Church.

A rare pamphlet in the library of the editor bears the following quaint title: "A Strange and Terrible Wunder Rouget Verie Lately in the Parish Church of Bungay; namely, on the fourth of thys August in the Yeere of our Lorde 1577." The story, stripped of the quaint language in which it is couched, and briefly told, is as follows: A storm of extraordinary fury raged during divine services in the church alluded to; rain fell in torrents and the lightning flashed "blue, red, green, and in a mixture of indescribable colors," while the thunder peals "not only bequieted men and dumb creatures but senseless things devoid of all life and feeling trembled and shook with terror."

While the tempest was at its height, a fiend from the lower regions appeared in the midst of the terror-stricken congregation. The account says: "It was in forme, as well as could be discerned, of an enormous dog, of black color, the sight whereof, together with fearful flashes of fire which then were seen, moved many minds to the belief that the end of time had come, and that doomes day was upon us." The evil one, for he it was in such strange likeness, ran with extraordinary speed into that portion of the church where the majority of the congregation was seated. In doing so, it passed between two persons who were upon their knees in the attitude of prayer, grasped and wrung the necks of both in an instant, so that they died presently as they knelt. As he passed by another he gave him such a grip on the back that he was drawn together and instantly shrunken up like a piece of leather scorched in a hot fire.

Leaving the church at Bungay, the devil is said to have "flown with a great noise and rustling" to the church at Blibury, seven miles away. He was seen to alight upon the roof and to instantly pass through it, dropping from the vaulted ceiling upon the heads of three persons—two men and a boy—who were all instantly killed, "beying scratched bye the horyd thing and burned to nearlie a cracklyng."

The "Book of Wonderous Visitations," published in 1680—110 years after the events mentioned above—says that the prints of the devil's claws where he ran down the aisle of the Bungay church were then plainly to be seen.—National Referendum.

Hard Hits at the Fetiche Worshipers.

There are two main ways in which the people assert themselves against oppression through the law-making machinery. One way is by revolution; by armed resistance continued covertly through generations, as in Russia, or asserted openly in the field, as when our forefathers organized their resistance to the stamp tax, for that also had the authority of a law which the wooden-headed executive officers of that time were determined to enforce. But armed revolutions are exceptional, and the almost universal way of defeating an obnoxious law is through the passive revolt of a whole people—the moral determination of the community that a law is bad and ought not to be enforced. In the face of such an attitude on the part of the people executive officers themselves, when they are gentlemen, resign their positions rather than array themselves on the side of the enemy.

But when the executive authority is not rationally directed, and is in the hands of persons each one of whom is "wiser in his own conceit than seven men that can render a reason," tyrannical legislation does not pass away by the easy process of a popular repeal. On the contrary, it produces a sort of permanent riot. One of the most striking cases of this in our history was that of the Fugitive Slave law. That law was looked upon with opprobrium in every Northern state, and in every conspicuous instance of its enforcement the troops had to be on duty. People would not admit the possibility of such a violation of freedom in free states. If whenever you have to enforce a law you must also fight a battle, the violation of the law is eventually winked at as a trifle by comparison with the consequences of enforcing it.

But the people of the North were never more determined in their opposition to slave hunting in free states than the people of this city are determined against the enforcement of a prohibitory liquor law in this city, as well as against the enforcement of a Puritanical observance of Sunday in defiance of our Constitutional guarantee of religious liberty. To force upon the people the cessation of all their ordinary amusements or occupations for a Puritanical Sunday is to compel a religious observance of a certain day, and such legislation is in violation of our constitutional rights. The people at large, we are sure, love a quiet Sunday, but there is no authority to compel them to it.—New York Morning Journal.

A Hypocrit Exposed.

These thirty thousand Adventists want the statutory laws which meet the approval of some twenty millions of Christians in this country changed to suit their views, or amended so as to give them the privilege of disregarding Sunday while denying the privilege to all who do not believe as they do.—Knoxville (Tenn.) Tribune.

Replying to this, the American Sentinel says with delightful irony that it supposes that not even the Tribune can be "held responsible for what it does not know, as it would be unfair to so hopelessly load down even a newspaper." Then it goes on to show that there is no reason whatever why the Tribune should not have known the real attitude of the Adventists. Last April, in a memorial presented to the legislature of Tennessee, they said:

We do not ask simply for a clause exempting us from the penalties of the law, but for the repeal of the law; because to ask simply an exemption would be to admit the right of the state to legislate upon such questions, and consent that the legislature might properly require of others that which we are not willing it should exact from us.

The Tribune proceeds to stultify itself by declaring that "the Adventist is not compelled to work on Sunday," the plain implication being that he is therefore without excuse for his violation of the law. It also says:

The law provides the largest religious freedom consistent with common sense and good government; it can not undertake to adjust itself to exactly suit the views of the Adventists whose peculiar ideas lead them into deliberate violation of the law.

The rank cant of this talk will be manifest to the reader when he learns that the Tribune issues a Sunday edition! Of course it is not worth while to enter into serious argument with such a hypocrit; he is beneath the contempt of a sincere man.

It is noticeable that the plea of the Knoxville sheet that the Adventists demand special privileges is the same as that put forth by the actors in and apologists for the Sunday-closing crusade in this city. It is said that the victims of this crusade demand "special privileges," which is unqualifiedly false. The party in interest that is demanding and receiving special privileges is the church, which claims and exercises the right to be open and do business on Sunday. Incidentally, the fashionable clubs and the big hotels and cafés are sharing in said privileges.

Our Missionary Work.

Several of our good friends have written us that in their opinion the work, "Self Contradictions of the Bible," should go along with Paine's "Age of Reason" as a missionary pamphlet. Mr. J. R. Perry puts it thus: "As a missionary document the 144 Self Contradictions will go hand in hand with the 'Age of Reason.' I think any person getting the one will get the other. It is the grubbing process, clearing out the roots and stones, necessary to preparing the soil for good seeds of common sense." And as it is our delight to furnish the implements for this sort of agricultural operations, we are willing to do our part and will send the "Self-Contradictions of the Bible" to those who will distribute it among their Christian friends, FOR A DOLLAR A DOZEN. Or we will send twelve copies to as many different addresses for one dollar.

Now let the friends of Freethought turn to and circulate "Self-Contradictions" as well as the "Age of Reason." Send both books out by the thousand and watch the result. Flood the country with them, and let the Christians know what their holy paper fetiche, the Bible, is like and why it is worthless as a guide to any good.

THE TRUTH SEEKER's offer to send eight copies of Paine's "Age of Reason" to eight different addresses for $1, to be used for missionary purposes, is still open. The best results are reported from this method of reaching intelligent believers and giving a new direction to their thoughts.

Last Chance to Obtain a Rare Book.

David Friedrich Strauss's "Life of Jesus Critically Examined" was first published in two volumes for $9. The edition ran out, and another was issued in one volume for $4.50. This edition is almost exhausted, less than fifty copies being in existence. Of what are left we have obtained a share, and can furnish them postpaid at the last price, $4.50. They will not last long, and we advise those of our friends who want a copy to send at once. When these are gone there will be no more to be had. This edition is translated from the fourth German edition by George Eliot, and contains 784 large octavo pages of solid reading, very clearly printed. It is unnecessary to say to students that this is a very valuable work, one which the church wishes had never been written, but which it cannot controvert.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed $3. I accept your offer of THE TRUTH SEEKER for one year and the "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book." I shall take pains to lend THE TRUTH SEEKER to friends and acquaintances each week.

Yours fraternally, J. EMERY.

CRESCENT, OK., Aug. 24, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $3, for which send me THE TRUTH SEEKER for one year and the "Pictorial Text-Book." We have an association of Freethinkers here, forty-four members, which almost takes the breath from the orthodox in these parts. The association was organized last spring. Yours against myth and superstition,

SOLDIERS' HOME, ORTING, WASH.,
Aug. 1, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $3 for paper and picture book, also 50c. for one copy of "Age of Reason" and "Voltaire." I am an inmate of the Soldiers' Home, am seventy-three years of age, from Pennsylvania, and of the late Ringgold Cavalry.

Please send a copy of your paper to the home occasionally. We number now 125 inmates.

A. DOBBS.

NIPOMO, CAL., Aug. 19, E. M. 295.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find money to pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER for one year. Send it to the Nipomo Freethought and Scientific Library, and we would consider it a favor to our struggling little society if you would send us "Old Testament Stories Comically Illustrated," as a premium with it, instead of the "Pictorial Text-Book," as we have that already. We also want "Right Living," two copies of "Crimes of Preachers," twelve copies of "The Glory of Infidelity," and twelve other pamphlets.

Our little society is prospering finely, and our library, though small, is growing. The churches hate us as only true "followers" can hate, and call the Library "the Devil's Den," but we are here, and, from all appearances, here to stay. There is a very bitter feeling among the Christian people since the debate last winter, and its influence can be felt even in politics. There has just been quite a sharp skirmish here over the trustees for our public schools, but a Freethinker carried off the long term and a Catholic one of the short terms, so, as God in his mercy has made the Catholics and Protestants to hate each other more than they do us, we are all right. With best wishes to THE TRUTH SEEKER, I remain,

BERTHA WILSON FOREMAN,
Sec. N. F. S. L. A.

He Is a Center of Instruction.

CONTINENTAL, O., Aug. 20, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $5. I have no very good excuse for not having sent it before, so will offer none. Let $4 apply on subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and send me something good for the balance. Three years ago, when I came to this place, I was the only outspoken Liberal here. Now there are several. I have quite a little Liberal literature, and it is out among the thinking people all the time.

We had Mrs. M. P. Krekel here last winter, and she set them to thinking. Wishing you success, I remain, Yours very truly, A. JACKSON.

For Mr. Wise.

SKULL VALLEY, ARIZ., Aug. 28, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed 50c. for the Wise Fund. I had made up my mind to sacrifice him, so far as I was concerned, but concluded it would do no good.

How is it that in this government "for the people, of the people, and by the people" a poor man can get no justice unless money is given him? Why is a law violated if a man has no money, but by raising so much money for him it is all right? If a poor man gets in the toils of the law, why must he also be a beggar or suffer disgraceful as well as painful punishment?

HENRY GOHRMAN.

Into the Priests' Ready Hands.

ST. CATHARINES, ONT., Aug. 16, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $2, to pay on THE TRUTH SEEKER, for a trial subscriber.

I give my paper away as soon as I read it. A great many like to read it, but do not want to subscribe for it; they are afraid of Mrs. Grandy or that it will hurt their business; and they want it on the sly. They will read it if some one else will pay for it. But Freethought is on the increase in this Canada of ours all the same. If we could get a Remsburg or a Putnam here to lecture this winter I think it would make quite a change in the people's minds. St. Catharines is a priest-ridden city, and a heavily taxed community, giving its last dollar to the church.

JOHN SECORD.

But Could Not Drop the Truth Seeker.

HEALDSBURG, CAL., Aug. 21, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I have allowed my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER to run behind, in consequence of our business supplying but little income above expenses, so that I have been considering where retrenchment should begin. We take many papers and magazines. I am loath to give up any as long as my sight lasts, which I cannot expect will be much longer, having entered on my eightieth year of life. I send my copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER to a poor friend, whose large family delights in reading. I inclose $3.25 for the ensuing year and a copy of Ingersoll's Bible lecture. I am delighted with Putnam's "Four Hundred Years of Freethought." I call it my Bible, and read it oftener than any other book.

Yours sincerely, THOS. P. TURNER.

The Heathen Sunday.

NEW YORK, Aug. 18, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: If we desire liberty the Sunday law must be repealed. If it is not, we are slaves to a set of fanatics.

Some people say, You must obey the law. What! when a law takes away one's liberty! I am now nearly eighty-six years of age; have traveled in most parts of the world, and never found any trouble in procuring a drink or something to eat on a Sunday, except at present in the great city of New York. Where is the freedom to worship God as the spirit dictates? A set of reformers take away my right to worship my god, nature, in the manner I consider the most reasonable. To forbid a man to buy bread and a drink when he is thirsty, is one of the greatest of tyrannies. If the God-fearing people think that the first day of the week, Sunday, should be observed as a holy day, let them keep the day holy and enjoy it. But let them not deny others the equal right of enjoying the same.

S. R. THORNE.

A Pupil Who Understands.

ELIZABETH, N. J., Aug. 26, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I am still a schoolboy, and have taken a great interest in the question of introducing the Bible into the public schools as a text-book, and think that the only department where it might be used would be in the kindergarten, where they might, for pastime, read the children such stories as that of Noah's ark, Jonah and the whale, and other mythical tales, of which the Bible is full. It can go no farther, as the pupils in the schools to-day take nothing for granted. They know that heaven and earth and all things on the earth were not made in six days, and that no one can go against the laws of nature without suffering the consequences, even if it is in the Bible. It is folly for a teacher to teach these things in the morning, and then, in the course of the day, teach just the opposite. It makes her out a hypocrite.

Inclosed you will find 25c., for which please send me a copy of "Self-Contradictions of the Bible," and also a copy of "Shall the Bible be Read in Our Public Schools?" and accept this as an idea of one who is a member of the public schools.

Respectfully, D. W. HENRY.

They Are Persecuting Now.

HOOPER, WASH., Aug. 1, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $1.75, for THE TRUTH SEEKER and Ingersoll's "Argument in the Reynolds Blasphemy Trial." I believe in the equality of man—equal rights to all, special privileges to none. I am opposed to all Sunday laws. If church members are so zealous for the observance of the Fourth commandment, why don't they keep holy the seventh day as commanded? Or why don't some of them take a tumble, and work six days out of the week?—"Six days shalt thou labor." How would this strike some of the stiff-necked preachers? Is this a land of the free, when a few fanatics can cause a person to be shut up in jail or put to work in the chain-gang for differing from them in opinion? Is this equal rights to all? Is this the straight and narrow road to heaven? Is this the way they love their neighbor as themselves? Would they revive the flames of persecution? Do they thirst for blood? For shame! Down with the Sunday law! Your paper was loaned to me, and I have read it with interest, and am glad to find so many noble-minded men who advocate equal rights; they have my respect and admiration.

I see many works advertised that I would like to send for, but cannot at present. You will hear from me again when my ship comes over. Yours for liberty and right,

H. H. SCOFIELD.

Ingersoll Helps Redeem America.

GREENE, N. Y., Aug. 23, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I received "Liberty for Man, Woman, and Child," and like it; it is one of the best books I ever read; the papers, too, are good. I wish I had seen something of that kind a few years ago. I would have got my eyes open. Still it may do some good yet. In a week or two I may be able to send for more. Some of your papers I have given to young men, and now the churches are down on me.

The little I have already done has given me the title of "Infidel," enemy of the church. I have had many a trial or trouble lately; the church members have worked my ruin more than once. I will now try to get up again.

August 28th.—To-night I received THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I think it is better and more powerful than ever before. I feel sorry to see so few who know anything about such a paper or men like Ingersoll and Paine. I am glad to see women are coming out of the dark into the marvelous light.

I have been here twenty-five years, and I am not a voter yet, because I have found so many liars and cowards and hypocrites among the citizens. I thought it best for me to keep out of an assembly of liars and hypocrites. I am bad enough outside them. Robert Ingersoll has made me think better of the citizens of America, and I would like to sell his books wherever I can.

ARTHUR HANSON.

"God" a Very Bad Manager.

ST. JOSEPH, MO., Aug. 25, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Having been a constant reader of your paper for several months, I feel it my duty as a Freethinking individual to express my thoughts that others may be benefited thereby. It has been a little hard for me to banish from my mind the thoughts of the cruelty of that imaginary being called God by the people at large, and Gaud by the sky-pilots and other gospel peddlers. That being is supposed and said to be an all-knowing and all-powerful being. Now, readers will think that to be an all-knowing being one must know everything that has transpired in the past, even back to the beginning of time, and to the end of time in the future. He must know every act of our lives even before we are created. If there is such a being as an all-knowing God, why did he make such men as Guiteau, John Wilkes Booth, Jesse James, and Jack the Ripper, knowing at the time he was bringing them into this world the very sins and crimes they were going to commit? Did he act wisely, or do you think it more foolish than wise? Just think of making a man, knowing at the time you were bringing him here that he was going to commit some great crime, and that after you had let him commit it you were going to condemn him and send him to hell. It is a fine merciful God! He is worthy of neither prayer nor song; he should be condemned, if there is such a being; but I hope there is not, and believe there is not. I do not think any all-wise, all-merciful, all-powerful, all-seeing being would conduct his business in such a way.

Your new friend, JOHN R. ALLEN.

The Theologians Challenged.

TITUSVILLE, PA., Aug. 7, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Why do the Seventh-Day Adventists disagree with most of the other Christians in not observing Sunday as their Sabbath day? Now let us see from teachings of the Bible the reason why they disagree, viz.:

"Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy."—Ex. xx, 8. And Ex. xx, 9, 10, 11.

"And they went into Capernaum, and straightway on the Sabbath day he entered into the synagogue, and taught."—Mark i, 21.

"But pray ye that your flight be not in the winter, neither on the Sabbath day."—Mat. xxiv, 20.

"And when the Sabbath was past, Mary Magdalene, and Mary the mother of James, and Salome, had brought sweet spices, that they might come and anoint him."—Mark xvi, 1.

"And they returned, and prepared spices and ointments; and rested the Sabbath day according to the commandment."—Luke xxiii, 56.

"And Paul, as his manner was, went in unto them, and three Sabbath days reasoned with them out of the scriptures."—Acts xvii, 2.

From these few passages we see that in both the Old and the New Testament Saturday, the seventh day, is recognized as the Sabbath day.

1. There is no divine command for Sunday observance.

2. There is not the least hint of a Sunday institution.

3. Christ never changed the Sabbath to Sunday.

4. He never observed Sunday as the Sabbath.

5. The apostles never kept Sunday for the Sabbath.

6. There is no prophecy that Sunday would ever take the place of the Sabbath.

7. The word Sunday never occurs in the Bible.

Nine Seventh-day Adventists, Christians, in the state of Tennessee, convicted by opposing Christians at the last term of court, are now working in the county chain-gang because they had worked on Sunday, the day which the Bible does not recognize as the Sabbath day. I now challenge the theologians to refute the above statements.

GEORGE SINNING.

The Genealogy of Jesus.

WORCESTER, MASS., Sept. 3, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: In the Letters of Friends in your issue of August 25th is a communication from Mr. Ed. Fuller, of West Salem, Ill., about the two genealogies of Christ. As it no doubt refers to mine of July the 20th, I would like to make a few observations about it.

Mr. Fuller is right about the two names unnoticed, but I do not see that it helps the case very materially. It rather makes it still more complicated. It looks to me as though the two names happen to be mixed up in two otherwise altogether different lines.

Mr. Fuller takes the ground (and the same is seen in the marginal notes of L'Abbé Glaire's translation of the Bible) that Luke gives the genealogy through the woman's side. Now, how could a correct genealogy of a man be given through his fathers-in-law? Suppose some of those women had married several husbands, which of them would have been given the child for a father? Or suppose one or several of them had married Gentiles (as in Samson's case), would Jesus, or rather Joseph, have been of the seed of David? Another thing that cuts it shorter still is that Mary's father was Joachim, according to the church of Rome (whether it is found in the Bible or not I could not say, and I cannot stop to look it up), and has been honored to this day by the Catholics as St. Joachim, the husband of St. Ann, grandmother of God on his mother's side; and I think that old mother of Christianity (the church of Rome) is as good an authority as any other on those things.

I don't see why Luke or the ghost that giv him his information should have taken that route while there was a shorter and better road, as Matthew has shown.

Then Mr. Fuller says, "As to the difference in the number of names given, I believe Matthew omitted several, and perhaps Luke omitted a few." How could Matthew have truthfully said Abraham begat Isaac, Isaac begat Jacob, and so on all through the list, if there were some that were omitted? Could a man be said to have begotten his grandchild, or his great-grandchild? "Omission is not contradiction." All right; but when Matthew says a man did something that he did not do, he is mistaken (or he lied), and that invalidates his claim to the truth altogether. I have known many to try to explain this, but I have never seen one that could do it successfully or with any show of logic. If Mr. Fuller can do it he will do very well indeed.

Mr. Fuller next goes on to talk of the Jews and their genealogical records. What have the records to do with the so-called holy scriptures, if those men were writing under the inspiration of the Holy Ghost? Could those men have written from records away back in the Old Testament time even as far as Adam? Were any records kept then? Were Genesis and the other books of the Old Testament written from records, or are they not claimed to have been written from inspiration?

Yours for something that looks more like the truth,
J. O. BELLEFLEUR.

PIERSON, IA., Sept. 1, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Those Bible apologists who attempt to reconcile the diverse genealogies of Jesus by the excuse that Matthew gives Joseph's genealogy and Luke Mary's, should remember that Mary's father was Joachim and not Heli, as Luke has it. Joachim was the husband of Anna, and hence father-in-law to Joseph. Joseph might have another father-in-law by a former wife, but he could not figure in Mary's genealogy. Theories built on guesswork only lead to worse confusion.

S. F. BENSON.

Indecent Parade.

NEW HAMPTON, IA., Aug. 25, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: On the 22d inst. I witnessed the most slavish and degrading occurrence it has ever been my lot to see. Because of the funeral of a minister all business places in this town were, as far as I could ascertain, closed for more than two hours. Christians, indifferents, and Infidels, all shut up shop in cowardly obedience to the ukase of the Methodists, whose hierophant the deceased had been. It was a demoralizing sight; and I expressed myself freely to that effect and caught "sheol" from all sides. Even time-serving non-Christians kicked because I did not look my shop in honor of the defunct. Of course I had no calls from customers for the time being, as nearly everybody was playing gaping booby in the courthouse yard, where the performance took place. Some Catholics and other non-Methodist Christians were sullen but submissive. Many of them expressed their disapprobation, but lacked backbone to maintain their independence, and cringed to Methodist arrogance and imposition.

Socially, Mr. Cook, the deceased, was a gentleman, having but very few of the usual priestly bombastic airs about him. In my several talks with him on religion, I discovered that he realized the weakness of his god-scheme, as also his inability to defend it when confronted with reason. When I endeavored to draw him into an argument he would say that we would surely get into deep water and be in danger of drowning. Being told that I was accustomed to that kind of water and had no fear, he would usually excuse himself very politely, well knowing that the Infidel could outswim the soul-fisher in the waters of fact.

I do not wish to be understood as objecting to honoring the dead, or rather their living friends and relatives, but I detest abominable public affairs such as the one described here, because of the religious importance attached to them. The corpse of a wood-chopper is as good as that of a preacher. If this man was doing good here, why did his god kill him or permit him to die instead of keeping him at his post?

Most of the Christians who timidly denounce this sort of public religious swagery would cheerfully accept the same thing in connection with the funerals of their own ministers, and will be quite apt to demand it when opportunity offers.

It is the duty of every real Freethinker to ventilate such pomp on the part of obtrusive pietists. Yours for fight,
F. L. DAUBERSMITH.

I Told You So.

WYMORE, NEB., Aug. 2, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: For some time this burg was and is still supposed to be a stamping-ground of that more than useless element, the beggar-on-horseback intermediators between God and man, commonly called heavenly dragoons or reverends. Those of the Baptist battalion inaugurated a "revival," and, with their supposed God's help—or rather with an imported evangelist family, quartered around on the faithful—felt their oats. And as "God had so wonderfully blessed the people," Infidels got a particularly big slice of the blessing in the sermons on Sundays, when the death-bed scenes of Infidels were too sweet a morsel for the mind-cripplers not to roll forward and backward incessantly in their food-wasting mouths. The children were told that Infidels were dishonorable, dangerous, dishonest men, who had not the courage to come out, as they had nothing to go on. This became a nuisance too great to bear, so a few of us concluded to give the "gentlemen of the cloth" a set-down.

We accepted an offer from Brother Remsburg to deliver a lecture here on August 1st. Meanwhile we were not idle, but worked like beavers to astonish the natives and make our undertaking a success. Printer's ink was called into requisition, and personal exertion was not spared, and soon every telegraph pole and other conspicuous spot in and around town was to be seen ornamented with a poster: "Lecture on Freethought. Subject: 'False Claims of the Church.' Admission free." The rage of the "elect" was great. Posters were torn down or mutilated, or camp-meeting notices pasted on them, but just as quickly were they re-posted, and camp-meeting notices covered with our new posters, regardless of the friendly advice given by our Christian neighbors, with a Satanic smile, to cease our efforts to force unpopular ideas on a Christian community (3,000 inhabitants, with six churches, of which only five are able to starve their preachers through).

At last August 1st came, when the first Freethought lecture in Wymore was to be delivered. We had rented the opera-house, but had our misgivings about the size of the audience. Thomas Paine's picture, life-size bust, was set up on the stage, with plenty of flowers in front of it. At 8 o'clock at night the first of the audience appeared, and such a rush set in that by 8:30 over 400 people graced the hall, the biggest audience a lecturer ever had in Wymore, and that in spite of the first night of a district camp-meeting, where a woman preacher painted to terrified sinners the awful consequences of starving poor preachers, and the reward for filling them full of good things. There was also a Democratic county convention in session at Beatrice.

Our audience was composed half of women, a very promising feature. That our heads were swimming, is putting it very mildly. Mr. Remsburg delivered his lecture in the forcible way peculiar to him, and he took well with the audience, his logic making an impression on many, convincing them that the church claims entirely too much of the benefits to the world, and that its jacket is fully as dirty as is often claimed by us. To judge by the audience, the cause of Freethought is not quite so unpopular here as Christians want to make us believe, of which fact four preachers who were present had an ample chance to be convinced. We were much gratified to notice that not the least misconduct marred the occasion, even when Mr. Remsburg made the people acquainted with that good man and patriot Thomas Paine, eulogizing him for what he had done for this country, and touching the unbelief of Washington and others down to Abraham Lincoln.

We have made several efforts to organize, but have so far failed through Infidel indifference.

How Did Jesus "Die for Men"?

LEAVENWORTH, KAN., Aug. 4, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Since you took my bit of serio-jocoseness concerning Jesus to heart, allow me to explain: Yes, I read J. Symes's articles, but contumaciously refuse to accept his "estimate" of the Nazarene. The only thing in my piece possibly justifying your speaking of my "estimate" of Jesus was my associating him with Paine and Ingersoll as an Infidel.

Our revered Bennett sinned in the same way. He gave him a prominent place among the "World's Sages, Infidels, and Thinkers," remarking that "they will hardly deny him the dignity of a Sage; they cannot truthfully claim that he was not Infidel to much at his time, and they will scarcely contend that he was unworthy to be esteemed a Thinker. In the character attributed to him there is much that is lovely, much that is human and benevolent, much that appeals to the finer feelings of our nature. It is not to be denied that the moral sentiments ascribed to him were of an excellent character, and that some of his utterances have rarely been excelled by the moral teachers of the world."

With Mr. Bennett I believe in recognizing Jesus as a sage, Infidel, and thinker—in the domain of spiritual science at least. But that he fought the church and was by it cruelly murdered is enough for us to know. When Symes declares that "he is all or nothing, a God or a sucked orange, his boasted character all the invention of his worshippers," he simply writes himself down a prejudiced extremist. Between the two extremes, "God or a sucked orange," there is little to choose. They are equally absurd.

All intelligent and sane Christians have really abandoned the dogma of the godship of Jesus. Even in debate with one who affirms his godship nothing is gained by putting him under microscope and scalpel and subjecting his alleged utterances to the merciless dissection of materialistic or literal interpretation. There are far more efficacious methods of proving his humanity. To convert a man from belief in the godship of Jesus, you want to be fair and accord to him all due honor as a man and as a great spiritual teacher. To belittle or demean him, to rob him of that to which he is entitled, is to forfeit the respect of your opponent and confirm him in his superstition.

We should take Jesus as a whole, and discredit what is inconsistent with his general character. To believe that he could get mad and curse a fig-tree for not bearing out of season, requires an abnegation of sense equal to believing him a god. Still, I do not care how imperfect he may have been. Jim Bludso's one act of holding "her nozzle again" the bank till the last galoot's ashore, was enough to absolve him of all his faults and emblazon a halo of glory about his name.

Jesus and Jim both "died for men," and that places their names upon the highest summit of human honor. I do not care if Jim had forty wives in Natchez-under-the-Hill and fifty here in Pike. I'm not the one to pick flaws in his character. His name is down in my calendar of saints.

Mohammed is another of my saints. With much delight I have read over and over again his life and studied his character and teachings. My human "ideals" are not faultless by any means. An absolutely perfect person, real or ideal, I have little use for. We Westerners have notions and standards of greatness all our own.

Nearly forty years ago, in the mountains, I had a partner, a Missourian, who could neither read nor write, but who knew how to drink whisky, "chaw terbacker," fight, swear, gamble, or do pretty much everything else, I reckon, except lie, steal, or go back on a friend. He was one of nature's noblemen, one of the bravest, truest, gentlest, and most loveable men I ever met. I saw him stake his life to save a friend, and—plump down on my roll of saints and heroes went the name of Charley Spangler.

"If this be treason, make the most of it."
S. R. SHEPHERD.

[Had Jesus denounced any of the great evils of his time we might accord to him the dignity of sage and thinker. But we fail to see that he attacked fundamental wrongs; he abused the priests and educated classes in the community, just as certain Christians do the same classes to-day, but, like them, he failed to get to the root of the trouble; he denounced individuals without understanding the underlying wrongs that alone made them dangerous. He was "Infidel," to a certain extent, to the old priesthoods, but so was Joseph Smith without being an improvement on them. As a contributor to THE TRUTH SEEKER very voluminously and conclusively showed, the practical teachings of Jesus, where they differed from the similar teachings of the Old Testament, were in almost all respects immeasurably inferior thereto, both on the side of equity and that of practicability. Vague general assertions cannot prevail as against the great mass of facts carefully marshaled by Mr. Cooper in this paper last year.—Ed. T. S.]

Keep Your Eye on the Compass.

Keep your eye on the compass
If the sea runs high,
And the ocean's inky billows
Mock the blackness of the sky.
When beating up against the winds,
So pitiless and strong,
Keep your eye on the compass,
And you can't go wrong.

Keep your eye on the compass
And your white light trimmed,
Though the moon hide in the heavens
And the stars are dimmed.
Though the voyage may be lonely
And the way seem long,
Keep your eye on the compass,
And you can't go wrong.

Keep your eye on the compass;
It will guide you o'er the deep,
It will show you where the north star is
And where the flowers sleep
In the sunny south. No matter.
If the way seems long,
Keep your eye on the compass
And you can't go wrong.

How I Shall Get to Heaven.

Many people seem to be concerned about my hereafter, as to whether I shall ever reach the heavenly kingdom or not. I am frequently questioned upon the subject, both orally and by letter.

To set the minds of these friends interested in my behalf forever at rest, I conclude to answer their queries, one of which came verbally this morning in this wise:

"And do you think you'll ever get to heaven?"

"Why, yes, certainly," was my reply. "If there is such a place, and anybody else goes there, I shall."

"What makes you think so?"

"Because I have a right to go there if I wish to, and no one has any power to keep me away," which caused my interlocutor to stare somewhat savagely at me, as he asked:

"But what merit have you to enter the abode of the sanctified, for the dear Christ's sake?"

"None whatever for Christ's sake."

"How, then, will you be justified, you sinner?"

"On the score of humanity, and I am not a sinner more than you, or any other human being. I obey the laws of the state, the health laws, the moral laws, pay all my honest debts—and I have no other debts—and do whatever is in my power to ameliorate the condition of the unfortunate and unhappy. What more can you ask?"

As my questioner was silent, I proceeded: "If I should die to-night, and my soul, which we will take to be the intelligent part of myself, the ego, should suddenly find itself free, and able to navigate the air, it would undoubtedly start on a tour of discovery and investigation."

"Where is heaven?" would be my inquiry.

Some one would probably say, "Up there!" and direct me which road to take. Arriving at the gate of the much-talked-of city, I would be halted by the famous St. Peter, who would at once begin to catechize me as to my right to enter the heavenly abode. I should relate to him the following incident: Once upon a time, while dwelling on the earth, there lived in my family a man of African descent, familiarly known as "Joe," or Joseph Williams. He was born in Halifax, Va., in the condition of slavery, and that condition had kept him in ignorance of the exact date of his birth. He was held as a bondman by Christian men who found indorsement of their acts in the Holy Bible. Finally, made free by the Great Rebellion, he drifted north, and found a home eventually in our family.

For many years he was a faithful servant and friend, trusty, fond, and obedient.

He was large-hearted, generous to a fault, or, as some would say, reckless and improvident, i. e., he had never been taught prudence and economy, and hence was like many another, utterly unable to lay up any part of his earnings against rainy days—the days that come sometime in almost every person's life. Finally, in old age, the rainy weather overtook this poor man with the dark skin, and he fell sick with a sickness that knows no relief till one enters "the low green tent whose curtain never outward swings."

Those knowing the case said, "Of course you will send him to the poorhouse. He has no claim on you, and you must not burden yourself with this sick and infirm black man, who was your servant, but is now unable to serve you longer."

"For that very reason," I said, "he will not be sent to the poorhouse like some useless old pauper, there to linger and, at last, to die, perhaps unattended and alone."

"But, he will be cared for well enough," was the answer; "let him go. You are not bound to take upon yourself this great burden."

This was the reasoning of the world.

But he did not go to the poorhouse. No. Looking above and beyond caste, creed, color, condition of servitude, I saw only a poor fellow-creature, sick and suffering, and to whom my hands could minister.

He had been my faithful, patient, obedient helper these many years, and now, in his extremity, should I forsake him or begrudge him home and shelter the few months remaining to him? Not I.

And I cared for him, nursed him through the trying hours of illness, sat by his bedside, night and day ministered to his wants, and anticipated his wishes. I soothed his restless hours of pain, was patient with all his querulous complainings, amused him with story and anecdote during the intervals when he would be free from intense suffering; smoothed his pillows, was quick to respond to his calls at midnight as by daylight; bathed his aching head, held his hands in the paroxysms of distress and agony; cheered him with kind, encouraging words when despondent and downhearted; performed the most menial service required in the sick room, prepared his nourishment, procured for him all that his fancy craved, took many steps, upstairs and down, watching over him carefully and kindly. And all through that most painful and trying illness, not one impatient word escaped my lips. At all times, day and night, I was the care-taker, nurse, and friend of this poor, dying man.

He was a member and officer in good and regular standing in the A. M. E. church, and, incidentally, I would say that it was in support of that church and its pastor that his money had mostly gone. When he lay sick and restless, did pastor and his associate members come and care for him? They did not. True, they occasionally came in to pray, and that was all. When very near the closing hour, the pastor called and said, "Would you like me to pray, Joseph?" "No," said Joseph, "you have prayed with me many times, but your praying does no good. It does not relieve the pain nor help me at all, so you need not pray for me any more."

Auntie Bright's Lectures.

V.—CONCLUSION.

"We are going back to the city in a week," said Madge, a regretful cadence in her usually merry voice. "Auntie, can you not tell us something good to carry away with us, and thus add to our already rich collection of legends and traditions?"

"Your demands have been so many and variable," said her aunt, smiling, "that I shall have to study up some more before venturing to visit you next winter."

"Next winter," said Madge, musingly, her face resuming its animated expression. "Oh, auntie, how I shall look forward to that. Just imagine the fireside, and Auntie Bright with her charming stories? It seems like a desecration to say it, but, really, I am impatient for summer to be gone. Do you know that thought will recall those lines in a magazine I read somewhere?"

The summer was not such a dream, perhaps,

Of bliss as we thought 'twould be;
And the brilliant things we planned to do

Went amiss for you and for me.
But still it is gone for all of that,
And we raise our wistful eyes
To the land where beyond the winter snows,
Another summer lies."

"But the story! the story!" exclaimed Walter, who had listened to all this with ill-concealed impatience.

So very obediently Auntie Bright told them the story of

"THE SICILIAN VESPER."

It was on Tuesday in Easter, 1282, and Sicilians were holding a festival on the pretty esplanade near the city of Palermo. The French had long ruled Sicily with an iron hand. The Sicilians, whenever they assembled on a public occasion, were sure to be reminded of their servile and crushed condition by some act of tyranny from the dictatorial French. And they burned with patriotic ardor to throw off the rule of their oppressors, only waiting for some opportunity.

Lent had passed, and the zealous natives were at their gayest. Dancing, music, and song combined to form a pretty picture of their rural innocence and peace. Fair ladies and gallant soldiers feasted from little tables on the grass, and merry children played games under the stately trees.

Suddenly the French officers appeared among them, insolently ordering them to disperse, coming, as they claimed, to restore order. All happiness vanished, and fierce anger filled the Sicilians' hearts.

At last a Frenchman offered an insult to a lady, who fell fainting in terror at his words and impudent conduct.

"Death to the French!" shouted the husband of the injured woman. A young Sicilian sprang upon the offending French officer and killed him.

"Death to the French!" shouted the people. The Sicilians slew two hundred French people on the spot. The tables arranged for the festival were covered with blood. The angry crowd armed themselves with the weapons of those they had overcome.

"Death to the French!"

It was nightfall. The victorious Sicilians came rushing into Palermo, striking down every French person they met. The French people rushed to the church altars, but the Sicilians followed them there and reddened the churches with blood.

The startled monks thronged up
In the torchlight cold and dim,
And the priest let fall his incense cup,
And the virgin hushed her hymn;
For a boding clash, and a clanging tramp,
And a summoning voice was heard,
And fretted wall and tombstone damp
To the fearful echo stirred.

The peasant heard the sound
As he sat beside his hearth,
And the song and dance were hushed around.

And the fireside tale of mirth.
The chieftain shook in his bannered hall,
As the sound of war drew nigh,
And the warder shrank from the castle wall
As the gleam of spears went by.

Proud beings fell that hour,
The young and the passing fair,
And a flame went up from dome and tower,
The avenger's arm was there!
For wakened pride of an injured land,
Had burst its iron thrall;
From the plumed chief to the pilgrim band,
Woe, woe, to the sons of Gaul!
A night of slaughter followed; two thousand French people fell.

The morning sun with a quiet smile
Looked round o'er hill and glen,
O'er ruined temple and moldering pile.
And the ghastly forms of men.

Aye, the sunshine sweetly smiled
As its early glance came forth,
It had no sympathy with the wild
And terrible things of earth;
And the man of blood that day might read

In language freely given,
How ill his dark and midnight deed,
Became the light of heaven.

The massacre is known in history as the "Sicilian Vespers."
That is all.

"Oh, Auntie, that is terribly meager for five long months," said Madge, dolefully.

"I'm sorry, dear; but I am positively exhausted," returned Auntie Bright, kindly.

"Oh, what a greedy girl," cried Walter, notwithstanding the fact that he was far from guiltless. IDA BALLOU.

ROBT G. INGERSOLL

The Field-Ingersoll Discussion. Price, 25 cents.

In 1888 the Rev. Dr. Henry M. Field wrote an open letter to Colonel Ingersoll, with the intent to convert him. The letter was published in the North American Review, and was replied to by the person addressed. All our older readers know the value of this discussion. To those who do not remember it we can only say that they should lose no time in procuring a copy if they want a controversial treat.

The Ingersoll-Gladstone Controversy about Christianity. Price, 25 cents.

When the Field-Ingersoll Controversy closed in the North American Review the Christians felt that their champion had been very badly worsted in argument, and the publishers of the Review engaged the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone to attempt to rehabilitate the Presbyterian creed. He wrote a long letter to Colonel Ingersoll, to which the latter replied at length and, it is generally agreed, completely demolished the greatest controversialist Christianity can produce. These letters are now for the first time available in pamphlet form.

Myth and Miracle. Price, 25c.

This is one of Colonel Ingersoll's best lectures, but never before put into print. Everyone who has heard it will most certainly want it, and those who have not heard it will have a rare treat in its perusal, as something new from the Colonel, which also is something that everybody is looking for.

Of the Most Eminent Freethinkers, of the Past Four Hundred Years.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY announced in October that this superb work was at last ready for delivery. It had been in preparation for so long that some of the subscribers were getting a little impatient and wondering when they would have the opportunity to see for themselves whether it possessed all the merits claimed for it by the publishers. They did not realize the magnitude of the work, and that the six months' delay in getting it out was due to the fact that they were to have fifty per cent more reading than they had been promised and nearly three times as many portraits. Such was the case, however. Instead of six hundred pages of letter-press there are nearly nine hundred, and the fifty portraits promised in the prospectus have multiplied to one hundred and forty-one! Considering the fact that the illustrations are the most costly part of the book—as undoubtedly to many they will also be the most attractive—and properly estimating the expense of the extra three hundred pages of text, it is evident that the subscriber received about one hundred per cent more for his $5 than was guaranteed to him. Well, the nearly eleven hundred copies of the volume subscribed for were sent out, and now we know what the recipients think of their investment. Judging by the letters that reach this office, they are not only satisfied—more than satisfied—but surprised and delighted that they got such a bargain.

As for the subject matter of FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT, it covers nearly every phase of progress and development and presents them in such orderly sequence as to give the best possible picture of human evolution. In Part First we have Freethought as a manifestation and influence; in Part Second, as an organized force. With this history are given sketches of the lives of the men and women who have taken part in the movement. It unites the past and the present. It is a world book and a home book. It fulfils the promise of its inception, and is the most magnificent work ever issued by the Freethought Press.

WITH DAUGHTER'S BABE UPON HIS KNEES.

A new edition of that splendid prose poem "Life," by "the prince of orators," Col. R. G. Ingersoll. It is larger and better than the old edition, and can be framed or placed upon the table as an ornament. In the center of the card appear the portraits of the Colonel and the baby, surrounded by the prose poem, which has been truthfully described as, "one of the masterpieces of the orator and poet, who now, as far as we know, stands alone in the living world." It will make a delightful present, and will be a souvenir not only of intellectual greatness, but of artistic workmanship. It is printed on heavy board, gilt boveled edge. The size is 12x16 inches, and the price only 75 cents, post-paid.

Gems of Thought.

THERE is nothing more despicable than to jump over with the majority when you know it is wrong.—Galveston News.

SUNDAY ought to be a day of rest—a holiday. But it is not the business of the state to regulate the work and rest of the people or to interfere either with their fast or feast days.—New York World.

FAIR play for the Seventh day keeper, the Hebrew and the Freethinker, as well as for the Puritan-Sunday advocate! Less than this is illiberal, inconsistent, and most decidedly un-American.—Boston Globe.

EVERY reader of Huxley's writings inevitably gets an insight and an impulse that forever after makes it harder for him to confound things that contradict or disagree with other things known to be true.—Springfield (Mass.) Republican.

THOUGH all the winds of doctrine were let loose to play upon the earth, so Truth be in the field, we do ingloriously, by licensing and prohibiting, to misdo her strength. Let her and Falsehood grapple—who ever knew Truth put to the worse in a free and open encounter?—John Milton.

THE sympathy which prompts denial of self to please others, is a sympathy which also receives pleasure from their pleasures when they are otherwise originated. The stronger the fellow-feeling which excites efforts to make others happy, the stronger is the fellow-feeling with their happiness however caused.—Herbert Spencer.

OUR legislators are not sufficiently apprised of the rightful limits of their power—that their true office is to declare and enforce only our natural rights and duties and to take none of them from us. No man has a natural right to commit aggression on the equal rights of another, and this is all from which the laws ought to restrain him.—Thomas Jefferson.

It used to be a very hard word to fling at anybody to say that he was a Materialist, but that sort of word does not hurt so much now; and it is rather curious that a great many of these words which have been very hard in one generation, change sides and just hit the other people in the next. These eminent men have always been few in number, but we ought to speak of their numbers with the very greatest respect.—W. K. Clifford, F.R.S.

THE great artist is he who goes a step beyond the demand, and, by supplying works of a higher beauty and a higher interest than have yet been perceived, succeeds, after a brief struggle with its strangeness, in adding this fresh extension of sense to the heritage of the race. This is why we value art; this is why we feel that the iconoclast and the Puritan are attacking something made holier, by solid usefulness, than their own theories of purity; this is why art has won the privileges of religion.—George Bernard Shaw, in Liberty.

IN the most general acceptance of the term, justice is a moral virtue which leads us to render to every one that which is his due, and to respect the rights of others. The term is sometimes used as synonymous with fulness of right and reason. It is used especially to designate the act of recognizing the rights of a person. The Roman law defined justice to be the constant and perpetual disposition to render every man his due. This is the definition of justice which has been most generally accepted by jurists and publicists. The essential conditions of justice are these: It should be equal, it should know no distinction of race or class, it should be accessible to all.—John J. Lalor.

FOR many years this restless man [Voltaire] filled Europe with the product of his brain. Essays, epigrams, epics, comedies, tragedies, histories, poems, novels, representing every phase and every faculty of the human mind. At the same time engrossed in business, making money like a millionaire, busy with the gossip of courts, and even with the scandals of priests. At the same time alive to all the discoveries of science and the theories of philosophers, and in this Babel never forgetting for one moment to assail the monster of superstition. Sleeping and waking he hated the church. With the eyes of Argus he watched, and with the arms of Briareus he struck. For sixty years he waged continuous and unrelenting war, sometimes in the open fields, sometimes striking from the hedges of opportunity—taking care during all this time to remain independent of all men. He was in the highest sense successful. He lived like a prince, became one of the powers of Europe, and in him, for the first time, literature was crowned.—Ingersoll.

AN ANTIDOTE ANALYZED. Reply to a Christian who had attacked Freethinkers, and Exposing the Inconsistency of Christians generally. H. C. Luse.

BIBLE TEMPERANCE. Showing that Liquor Drinking is Commended, Defended, and Enjoined by the Bible. Edwin C. Walker.

CHRISTIANITY A REWARD FOR CRIME. Authenticated by the Bible. O. B. Whitford, M.D.

DID MAN FALL? Is the Garden of Eden a Fact? Israel W. Groh.

EPIDEMIC DELUSIONS. A Lecture by Frederic R. Marvin, M.D. Giving reasonable reasons for Religious and other Delusions.

FALSE CLAIMS OF THE CHURCH. John E. Remsburg's most noted work, and one of the most effective ever written by any Freethinker.

FIRST EPISTLE OF BENNETT THE APOSTLE TO THE TRUTH SEEKERS.

Written while journeying in and near the land of Yahweh. Containing the best moral instructions of the world from the great teachers of the former ages. D. M. Bennett.

THE GIANT DELUSION. A paper read before the Freethought International Congress at Chicago. One of Otto Wettstein's fraternal attacks on Spiritualism.

THE GLODY OF INFIDELITY. To which is added a poem on Thomas Paine. One of Samuel P. Putnam's most brilliant lectures. Every Christian who asks the idiotic question, "What Has Infidelity Done?" should be induced to read this book, if he has to be paid to do it.

HOW CAN WE BE SAVED? Was Jesus Supernaturally Conceived, and did he Rise from the Dead? Israel W. Groh.

INGERSOLL AND JESUS. Showing how the two agree. A poem by Samuel P. Putnam.

THE LIMITATIONS OF TOLERATION. A discussion between Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, Hon. Frederic R. Coudert, Ex-Gov. Stewart L. Woodford, before the Nineteenth Century Club of New York. "Each man has the same right to express to the whole world his ideas that the rest of the world have to express their thoughts to him." Colonel Ingersoll maintains this, the others deny it. Mr. Coudert is a Roman Catholic, Mr. Woodford a Protestant.

MATERIALISM: Its History, and Its Influence Upon Society. Dr. Louis Buchner.

MIRACLES AND MIRACLE WORKERS. A consideration of the Marvels and Miracles of the New Testament. One of John Peck's best books.

MOSES BEFORE THE COURT, or The Forgery of the Old Testament. Dedicated to the Clergy. H. J. Seignuret, M.D.

THE NEW GOD. "It is an open secret that man has always made his Gods. They exist in and through him, as the image exists in and through the mirror. Take away man and you take away God—the image vanishes." This pamphlet, therefore, is a consideration of what kind of a God man should make. Samuel P. Putnam.

ORTHODOXY. A lecture by Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll, and one of that great man's best. The subjects considered are: Orthodox Religion Dying Out, Religious Deaths and Births, The Religion of Reciprocity, Mohammed, The Destruction of Art, The Discovery of America, Copernicus and Kepler, Charles Darwin, Special Providence, The Latest Creed, God as a Governor, The Love of God, The Fall of Man, The Atonement, The Second Birth, Inspiration, The Reign of Truth and Love, The Wars It Brought, The Resurrection, The Judgment-Day, Pious Evasions, "No Bible, No Civilization," Miracles of the New Testament, The Ascension, Casting out Devils, Necessity of Belief, Eternal Punishment, Some Who Are Damned, What I Believe, Immortality. This lecture is on the famous text, "The Clergy know that I know that they do not know."

PERSONAL EXISTENCE AFTER DEATH IMPROBABLE. L. R. Smith.

PROCEEDINGS OF THE CIVIL RIGHTS MASS MEETING AT LINCOLN HALL, WASHINGTON. Being the Speeches of Hon. FREDERICK DOUGLASS and Col. ROBERT G. INGERSOLL on the Decision of the United States Court that the Civil Rights Act is Unconstitutional. Fifty-three large octavo pages, of which Colonel Ingersoll's speech occupies 38 pages.

PULPIT, PEW, AND CRADLE. So long as the Pulpit speaks to believing Pews composed chiefly of mothers, the cradle will be rocked by ghosts and the race will remain on its knees to a devil of its own creation and to a God who is powerless against him. One of Helen Gardner's brightest efforts.

THE RELIGION OF HUMANITY BETTER THAN ETERNAL PUNISHMENT. M. Babcock.

RELIGIOUS PROBLEMS. One of L. K. Washburn's best lectures, and it is, like all of his, very good.

THE ROARING LION ON THE TRACK. One of M. Babcock's comical sermons.

SCIENCE vs. RELIGION, or The Conflict Between Reason and Superstition. T. C. Widdicombe.

ST. MATTHEW BEFORE THE COURT. Presenting the evidence of the forgery of his alleged gospel. H. J. Seignuret.

SISTER LUCY AND HER AWFUL DISCLOSURES REGARDING NEW HALL CONVENT. Showing that Convents are inimical to chastity, virtue, and freedom.

SPIRITUALISM FROM A MATERIALISTIC STANDPOINT. B. F. Underwood. Written before Mr. Underwood joined the Psychic Researchers.

THUMBSCREW AND RACK. Torture Implements Employed in the 15th and 16th centuries for the promulgation of Christianity. Being the Nuremberg Collection, with specimens from the Holy Inquisition. 28 pictures. The descriptions and reflections by George E. Macdonald.

VICTOR HUGO'S ORATION ON VOLTAIRE, delivered on the one hundredth anniversary of Voltaire's death. Translated by James Parton, author of the Life of Voltaire. To which are added the three great poems of Goethe, George Eliot, and Longfellow.

WAS CHRIST CRUCIFIED? Austin Bierbower. A lawyer's consideration of the evidence of that alleged event.

WAS JESUS INSANE? A consideration of Christ's alleged acts which would lead one to that conclusion. L. K. Washburn.

WHY DON'T HE LEND A HAND? And other Agnostic Poems. Samuel P. Putnam. The title poem is perhaps the most popular of Mr. Putnam's many poems, and a great many editions of it have been called for. The other poems are: "The Golden Age, The Ideal and the Real, Not Dead, but Living, Fruition, Hope, Thomas Paine, Nature's Gospel, Address to Deity, and the short poem so often recited with great effect by Charles Watts, Give Us Light."

WILL THE COMING MAN WORSHIP GOD? B. F. Underwood; written before Mr. Underwood joined the Psychic Researchers.

WOMAN: FOUR CENTURIES OF PROGRESS. A lecture delivered at the Freethinkers' International Congress at Chicago. Considering: The Cause of Woman's Subjugation, The Canon Law and its Effects Upon Her, Theology Never Helpful to Woman, Invention Woman's Friend, Freethought the Benefactor of Woman. Susan H. Wixon.

WOMAN: HER PAST AND PRESENT, HER RIGHTS AND WRONGS. A lecture delivered before the Woman Suffrage Association of Denver, Col., by B. F. Underwood.

Liberty for Man,

Woman, and Child

"Reading this lecture," remarked a friend the other day, "will make men better; for if a man reads it one night on his way home, the next night he will take along some oranges or something to his family." This lecture is gotten up in the handsome style of "Voltaire" and "Lincoln," and has as a frontispiece a fine photo-engraving of the Colonel and both his grandchildren, Eva and Robert, the little fellow upon his knee, and Eva in her high chair. It is a pretty picture, and the Colonel's millions of friends will take pleasure in it. In this pamphlet is also the Colonel's Tribute to His Brother, which so many have desired to have in convenient form. Price, 25 cents.

VOLTAIRE

"Voltaire was the greatest man of his century, and did more to free the human race than any other of the sons of men." A lecture by INGERSOLL, with portrait of Voltaire. A handsome pamphlet. Every Freethinker will surely want it. Price, 25 cents.

LINCOLN

This is Colonel INGERSOLL's great lecture, printed in a handsome pamphlet, and containing the Century's famous portrait of Lincoln—said to be the best extant. Price, 25 cents.

SHAKSPERE

"An intellectual ocean, whose waves touched all the shores of thought." A lecture by INGERSOLL, with likeness of Shakspeare from the Kesselstadt death mask. Price, 25 cents.

GENTLE ALICE BROWN.

It was a robber's daughter, and her name was Alice Brown. Her father was the terror of a small Italian town; Her mother was a foolish, weak, but amiable old thing; But it isn't of her parents that I'm going for to sing.

As Alice was a-sitting at her window-sill one day, A beautiful young gentleman, he chanced to pass that way. She cast her eyes upon him, and he looked so good and true That she thought, "I could be happy with a gentleman like you."

And every morning passed her house that cream of gentlemen, She knew she might expect him at a quarter-unto-ten. A sorter in the Custom House, it was his daily road. (The Custom House was fifteen minutes' walk from her abode.)

But Alice was a pious girl, who knew it wasn't wise To look at strange young sorters with expressiv purple eyes, So she sought the village priest to whom her family confessed— The priest by whom their little sins were carefully assessed.

"O holy father," Alice said, 'twould grieve you would it not? To discover that I was a most disreputable lot! Of all unhappy sinners, I'm the most unhappy one." The padre said, "Whatever hav you been and gone and done?"

"I hav helped mamma to steal a little kiddy from it's dad, I've assisted dear papa in outting up a little lad, I've planned a little burglary and forged a little check, And slain a little baby for the coral on its neck."

The worthy pastor heaved a sigh and dropped a silent tear, And said, "You mustn't judge yourself too heavily, my dear. It's wrong to murder babies, little corals for to fleece, But sins like these one expiates at half-a-crown apiece.

"Girls will be girls. Your very young and flighty in your mind; Old heads upon young shoulders we must not expect to find. We mustn't be too hard upon these little girlish tricks— Let's see, five crimes at half-a-crown; exactly twelve-and-six."

"O father," little Alice cried, "your kindness makes me weep, You do those little things for me so singularly cheap. Your thoughtful liberality I never can forget, But oh, there is another crime I havn't mentioned yet.

"A pleasant-looking gentleman, with pretty purple eyes, I've noticed at my window, as I've sat a-catching flies; He passes by it every day as certain as can be, I blush to say I've winked at him and he has winked at me!"

"For shame," said Father Paul, "my erring daughter! On my word This is the most distressing news that I hav ever heard. Why, naughty girl, your excellent papa has pledged your hand To a promising young robber, the lieutenant of his band.

"This dreadful piece of news will pain your worthy parents so! They are the most remunerativ customers I know. For many, many years they've kept starvation from my doors. I never knew so criminal a family as yours!

"The common country folk in this insipid neighborhood Hav nothing to confess, they're so ridiculously good; And if you marry any one respectable at all, Why, you'll reform, and what will then become of Father Paul?"

The worthy priest he up and drew his cowl upon his crown And started off in haste to tell the news to Robber Brown; To tell him how his daughter, who was now for marriage fit, Had winked upon a sorter, who reciprocated it.

Good Robber Brown he muffled up his anger pretty well. He said: "I hav a notion, and that notion I will tell; I will nab this gay young sorter, terrify him into fits, And get my gentle wife to chop him into little bits.

"I've studied human nature, and I know a thing or two; Though a girl may fondly love a living gent—as many do— A feeling of disgust upon her senses there will fall When she looks upon his body chopped particularly small."

He traced that gallant sorter to a still suburban square, He watched his opportunity, and seized him unaware; He took a life-preserver and he hit him on the head, And Mrs. Brown dissected him before she went to bed.

And pretty little Alice grew more settled in her mind; She never more was guilty of a weakness of the kind, Until at length good Robber Brown bestowed her pretty hand On the promising young robber, the lieutenant of his band.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—[Freethinkers' Magazine.]

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of his volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—[Boston Investigator.]

A small farm of 10 acres 86 perches, located within one and a half miles of Media county seat and within four miles of Chester, Pa., on the Delaware river. Several springs of soft water good timber growing on the place, some choice apple and pear trees in fruiting condition. House and barn on the place, but are old buildings. Within five minutes' walk of the railroad station, 3 miles from Philadelphia. Trolley line between Media and Chester, with less than five minutes walk.

The place is specially well located for a florist, and it would be a fine summer residence for one who would put a modern house on it. Eight years ago the land adjoining sold for $618 per acre, and no land near it has sold as low as that since. Several smaller places have sold at $1,000 per acre. The land slopes toward the southwest, overlooking beautiful woodland scenery.

Hard Knocks
at Christianity.

By R. WHEELER.

This book is just what its title implies—thumping whacks at superstition. It deals with the effect of Christianity on the world, showing what Christians have done to advance their religion and impede the progress of man. It shows that Jesus was a false prophet, that the gospels are not authentic, and that Christianity is a borrowed system of religion. That the Bible is not in accord with Science, that the atonement scheme is futile and foolish, and that religion is not a real benefit to man.

THE DOOM OF PRIESTCRAFT.

Special NEW SUBSCRIBER Offer.

We wish, for two good and valid reasons, to greatly extend the circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER. First, we want its influence for good and its efforts for greater liberty of thought to be more widely distributed, and consequently more effective. Second, we want more subscribers to help pay its expenses and enable us to do more work. And we wish to emphasize both of these reasons. Our present subscribers can do a great deal for us if they will, and to get them to aid us we are willing to reward them; we therefore make this SPECIAL NEW SUBSCRIBER OFFER:

To any subscriber now on our list who will get a new name for the list for one year, sending us three dollars for the same, we will send free a copy of the FREETHINKER'S PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK, in board covers (price TWO DOLLARS)

And to anyone whose name is not now on our list we make this offer: Send us three dollars for the paper one year, and we will send you free the PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK.

The pictures in the FREETHINKER'S PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK were made and the text written to show the absurdity and untruthfulness of the Church's claim to being a divine and infallible institution, and to reveal the abuses of a union of church and state. It has 185 Full-page Illustrations, with copious citations of Facts, History, Statistics, and Opinions of Scholars to maintain the argument of the Artist. The Designs are by WATSON HESTON and include a portrait of the designer. The pictures are classified as follows: Of those representing Uncle Sam and the Priests there are 16; representing The Church Robbing the People, 2; Thanksgiving, 3; Sabbath Laws, 6; Children and the Church, 11; Woman and the Church, 10; The Church and Thomas Paine, 6; Studies in Natural History, 4; The Bible and Science, 2; The Clergy and Their Flocks, 15; Piety in Our Penitentiaries, 1; The Atonement Scheme, 4; The Lord and His Works, 4; Prayer, 2; The Creeds, 10; Christians and Mohammedans, 1; Samples of Christianity's Work, 2; Missionaries, 5; The Lord's Instruments, 1; Bible Doctrines and Their Results, 25; Church and Slavery, 1; Priests and Politics, 2; Ireland and the Church, 4; Church Ideas of Civilization, 2; Uses of the Cross, 1; Unkind Reflections on the Church, 4; Persecutions by the Church, 9; Some Allegories, 12; Heaven, 3; Hell, 6; Miscellaneous, 7.

This offer cannot apply to renewals. Premiums for them can be found on the second page of this issue. We are giving five dollars' worth for three in this offer, and there is no profit in it except that we shall get many renewals of these subscriptions; the subscribers will also, probably, buy a few books from time to time, and the small margin on them may make us whole. Induce your neighbor to subscribe, and so get the book for yourself. Or, if you are not now a subscriber, send us three dollars and get both paper and book—FIVE DOLLARS' WORTH FOR THREE DOLLARS.

Read what the papers and people hav said of the book and see if it is not worth while to make a strong effort to obtain it. The book has had a large run; five thousand copies hav been sold, and everyone who paid two dollars for it says it is worth a good deal more. Now we are giving it away, and you can get a copy if you will. Do not delay, but get it now.

SPECIMEN PRESS NOTICES.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait-painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—Freethinkers' Magazine.

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of this volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—Boston Investigator.

Send us a new subscriber and get the book free of all expense to you. Or, if you are not now a subscriber, send us $3 and get the book and the paper for one year.

What a New Subscriber, Who Has Received His Pictorial Text-Book, Says of It.

LAMAR, MO., May 8, 1895.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: The "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book" is received, and after a careful examination of the work I unhesitatingly pronounce it one of the most impressiv Freethought works ever issued from the press. It will indeed "corner the parson" and all his flock, and I shall take great pleasure in showing the book to my orthodox friends. As a reference book it is invaluable, and it should find a place in every Freethinker's library.

Respectfully, W. F. BRILEY.

Darwin and After Darwin.

An Exposition of the Darwinian Theory.

By GEORGE J. ROMANES.

A systematic Exposition of what may be termed the Darwinism of Darwin, and intended to be of service to the general reader rather than to professional naturalists.

Mr. Romanes is well known as one of the most interesting of English writers upon evolution, besides ranking with Professor Huxley in scientific knowledge and ability. And this is a part of his conclusion regarding the great subject of Design, to which the church so often refers:

"Thus whether we look to the facts of adaptation or to those of beauty, everywhere throughout organic nature we meet with abundant evidence of natural causation, while nowhere do we meet with any independent evidence of supernatural design. Adaptation and beauty are alike receiving their explanation at the hands of a purely mechanical philosophy. . . . All nature has thus been transformed before the view of the present generation in a manner and to an extent that has never before been possible; and inasmuch as the change which has taken place has taken place in the direction of naturalism, and this to the extent of rendering the mechanical interpretation of nature universal, it is no wonder if the religious mind has suddenly awakened to a new and a terrible force in the words of its traditional enemy—Where is now thy God?"

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with a little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroine. The narrative is, in the main, a history of a working-girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business-men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrites. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. All Pretense.

"As to the observance of the Sabbath, I believe it should be kept as a day of rest and quiet, as a holy day, for this seems necessary to the upbuilding of the nation, and for the instillation of a proper respect and reverence on this day, which is especially set apart for religious worship. This I have always preached in my own diocese."

"Do you, then, believe that a proper observance of the Sabbath implies total abstinence?"

"That is what I have urged in Baltimore. I believe the day should be given up to the uplifting of the heart to the Creator."—Cardinal Gibbons, in an Interview.

By this time every person not wholly blinded by prejudice or self-interest should be able to see that the demand for a day of "rest" is a false pretense, that the Sunday-law movement would never have been heard of had it not been for the desire of the priesthood to monopolize the day. The Roman prelate wants a day of "rest and quiet," a holy day, and he wants this because it is necessary for "the instillation of a proper respect and reverence on this day," which is "set apart for religious worship." He wants this day to be "given up to the uplifting of the heart to the creator." Who is interfering with the cardinal's right to so use the first day of the week? He can hold as many services as he chooses. Freedom of religious assembly is amply protected. He can celebrate mass, have all the solemn music he wishes, preach, hear confessions, administer extreme unction, bury the dead, and engage in all the other "duties" which his church imposes. But, to judge from his talk and that of his Protestant fellow-conspirators, one would imagine that the law forbids him and them to worship on Sunday. As this is the farthest possible remove from the truth, the question forces itself upon our attention, What is he and what are they growling about? The answer is right at hand. They are disgusted and angry because they cannot always, as the laws are now, force all other people to use Sunday for purposes of "religious worship," to uplift their hearts "to the creator" in the way acceptable to the priests and preachers. They feel outraged because they find some who dispute their authority to rob the people of one-seventh of their time. That is the hard, cold fact. Their liberty is not in danger, but they are determined to murder the liberty of their neighbors. In other words, they are priests, the enemies of mankind.

The One Conclusiv "Argument" of the Theocrat.

Our readers will find some highly interesting and very significant matter on page 599. The attack on THE TRUTH SEEKER there reproduced appeared in both the Christian Reformer and the Christian Statesman of August 31st. These papers are the representatives of the Reformed Presbyterian (Covenant) church and the National Reform Association (God-in-the-Constitution party). They stand for the extreme opposite of every principle of Freethought and Secularism. To the activity of that Association, its newspaper organs, and its lecturing and legislative agents is to be attributed, in a very great degree, the Revival of Puritanism that is now sweeping like a prairie fire over the whole country. The Association is the logical and dynamic heart and soul of the Sabbatarian and allied movements. Behind and to the right and left of this, the center corps of the army of reaction, are deployed all the other forces rallied for the overthrow of the secular republic and the assassination of civil liberty and justice. Where it leads, they follow as reserves and supports, some very close to the front, others farther removed, but all with one goal in view—the suppression of Freethought, the establishment of the Christian theocracy.

Unlike the Reformer and Statesman, THE TRUTH SEEKER does not fear to let its readers see what can be said on the other side. The Editor is convinced that he could not possibly fill the space occupied by the reprint with anything that could do more to awaken Liberals of all shades of belief to a realization of the imminence of the danger threatened by the rapid spread of theocratic ideas. It is beyond possibility of reasonable dispute that the Freethinker will find himself bound and gagged if the present crusade continues much longer to gain in popularity and strength. The utterances of the Christian Reformer and Christian Statesman show clearly at what points the attacks on us are to be made. The boast of Anthony Comstock is to be made good—Freethought publications are to be "stamped out" under the pretext that argument against and ridicule of Christianity are "indecent" and immoral; and it is to be contended that "blasphemy" is immoral because the enemies of free speech and press and mails know that they cannot suppress THE TRUTH SEEKER and other legitimate Freethought papers on the ground that they are "obscene" and "indecent" in the usual meaning of those words. The careless masses must be fooled into believing that "blasphemy" is corrupting and a menace to "society." In addition to this method of suppression, the theocrats will employ the blasphemy laws now slumbering in the statute books of a few of the states, and enact similar or more stringent ones in the remaining states.

SPECIMEN SOPHISTRIES AND UNSUPPORTED ASSERTIONS.

Now let us glance briefly at some of the assertions of the theocratic editors. In one paragraph we are told that of course we can "see nothing of immorality in the blasphemies against God and Christ" with which THE TRUTH SEEKER is said to abound each week, but in a subsequent paragraph the question is asked, "Do not the souls of these blasphemers shudder when they think of their awful responsibility to a tribunal, not human, before which they shall one day stand?" Only this question is required in answer to that: If we see nothing wrong in the cartoons and arguments named, why should our souls shudder at the prospect of sometime standing before a tribunal, not human, provided it is a just one? But these gentlemen are so fanatical in their belief that they seem to be unable to understand that what are awful realities to them are only myths and legends to others. We do not attack "God"—for we know absolutely nothing of such a being—but the ideas of a god held by our Christian and other Theistic opponents. It is passing strange that apparently sane and educated men cannot perceive so clear a distinction as this. We see in Jesus Christ, if such a person lived, only a man struggling as we all do with the wrongs of the world and the limitations of his own nature. We laugh at the claim that he was the son of God by a Jewish virgin, just as the Christian scouts the claims made for other virgin-born saviors by those who have been educated to believe in them. There is far less reason for believing that Jesus was a demi-god than there is for holding that certain things should be done in the full of the moon and other things in the first quarter, and yet we presume that these Christians do not think that they will have to answer at the "tribunal, not human," for laughing at the latter superstition. Why can they not comprehend and concede that we are as sincere in our skepticism as they are in theirs? Is it impossible for them to grasp the idea that there may be honest differences of opinion on the subject of religion, even to the extent that some shall reject all the pretensions made for all the teleological and "revealed" systems? As to ridiculing the "Word" of "God," our critics should know by this time that we attack the Bible, not as the word of any god, but as the production of fallible men—a work falsely claimed to be of divine origin? We say that it is an imperfect work, and hence could not have been written by a perfect being. The task of the Christian is to show that the Bible is perfect, not to prosecute its careful examiners for "blasphemy." All heresy and blasphemy laws are in reality laws to punish dissenters from the accepted opinions of the dominant power. Not discovering any evidence of the existence of a god, seeing in Jesus only a human reformer at most, and believing that the Bible is a collection of books written in different ages by many men of vastly varying degrees of intelligence and goodness, it logically follows that we are not attacking or "blaspheming" either the God, the Christ, or the Word. Our criticisms are directed against what we conceive to be the unfounded beliefs of our fellow men and women, and these criticisms are no more "blasphemous" than are their criticisms of our beliefs. We have just as much right to prosecute the Presbyterian Covenanters and the God-in-the-Constitution party as they have to prosecute us—that is, none at all. When men become so stupid or so knavish as to set up the claim that their opinions concerning gods, and saviors, and holy books and days, are the laws of an infinite God, it is time that their pretensions and their creeds were laughed at and argued against and antagonized in every other legitimate way.

BLASPHEMY UNKNOWN TO OUR CONSTITUTION.

The stuff which the Christian editors quote from Judge Cooley (the first paragraph quoted) is a reflection of the old common-law opinion of "blasphemy," an opinion which was logical and in place in the time when church and state were united, but which has no relevancy in this age and in a country where church and state are constitutionally separate. It is quite probable that the theocrats perceive this as clearly as we do, and this is why they are straining every nerve and exhausting every resource in the endeavor to put a Christian amendment into the Constitution, and thus make church and state practically one, and that one the church. Referring to the origin of blasphemy laws, and noting the discrimination in favor of "controversy among learned disputants," made by Judge Cooley in the second excerpt from his "Constitutional Limitations," Judge Parker, of Kentucky, in an opinion in a blasphemy prosecution, handed down in July, 1894, said:

"Under this constitution [Kentucky's] no form of religion can claim to be under the special guardianship of the law. The common law of England, whence our law of blasphemy is derived, did have a certain religion under its guardianship, and this religion was part of the law. The greatest concession made to religious liberty was the right of learned persons to decently debate upon controverted points. The essence of the law against blasphemy was that the offense, like apostasy and heresy, was against religion, and it was to uphold the established church, and not in any sense to maintain good order, that there was a law against blasphemy. The most superficial examination of the chapter in Blackstone treating of offenses against God and religion, must convince any mind that the sole aim and object of these laws was to preserve the Christian faith, as it was then understood and accepted by the established church. It may seem to us that the punishments for these offenses were severe in the time of Blackstone, but they had then been greatly mitigated, as the stake and fagot had been of but too frequent use in propagating what was deemed to be the true religion. Even Blackstone complains that the definition of heresy had been too uncertain, and that the subject had been liable to be burnt for what he had not understood to be heresy until it was decided to be so by the ecclesiastical judge who interpreted the canonical scriptures. To deny any one of the persons of the trinity, or to allege that there were more gods than one, was a heresy and was punished in the same manner as apostasy.

"Blasphemy is a crime grown from the same parent stem as apostasy and heresy. It is one of a class of offenses designed for the same general purpose, the fostering and protecting of a religion accepted by the state as the true religion, whose precepts and tenets it was thought all good subjects should observe. In the code of laws of a country enjoying absolute religious freedom there is no place for the common-law crime of blasphemy. Unsuitable to the spirit of the age, its enforcement would be in contravention of the constitution of this state, and this crime must be considered a stranger to the laws of Kentucky."

This is the American position, the Nineteenth century position, THE TRUTH SEEKER's position. The Christian Reformer, et al., wish to take their law from the ages of persecution, from the nations where there was a state church, and this proves that they are working for a state church, that they are ready and eager to persecute.

Drs. McAllister and George, Rev. Mr. Wiley, and the rest of the staffs of the two theocratic papers, should know that what they have quoted from Cooley is wholly out of place in a state having a modern, a civilized system of jurisprudence. The definition of "blasphemy" there given is in the language of men who believed that rejection, or even mild criticism, of their beliefs was a willful attack upon God himself and all that was worth preserving in the moral universe. They put themselves in the place of their deity, and imprisoned, hung, quartered, and burned men and women in his name and for a criticism of themselves, which they falsely said were criticisms of him. The Freethinker does not speak "evil of the deity"; but he shows the childishness and barbarousness of men's conceptions of what they call the deity. He does not engage in this work "with an impious purpose to derogate from the divine majesty," for of that he knows no more than do the Christians, but rather he speaks to rebuke the unworthy views which the latter entertain regarding what they are pleased to call God. He is not trying "to alienate the minds of others from the love and reverence of God," but to express his own convictions, and to lead others to think for themselves concerning the cosmos and the phenomena of life. Only the most besotted superstition could lead a jurist to say that the Freethinker "purposely" uses words "concerning the supreme being calculated to impair and destroy the reverence, respect, and confidence due to him as the intelligent creator, governor, and judge of the world." For the Freethinker, the supreme being pictured by the Christian does not exist, and hence he cannot deliberately set himself to work to destroy the respect given him as the creator, governor, and judge of the world. He recognizes the existence of no such being, and therefore cannot attack him. This should be self-evident. Whatever, if any, deity he worships, he does not laugh at or criticise. This, too, should be self-evident. The, to him, unfounded beliefs of others are what he rejects, just as the Christian rejects the, to him, unfounded beliefs of the "pagan" and "heathen."

CANNOT SLANDER MYTHS.

It is the height of folly to accuse one of deliberately trying to calumniate a man or a god whom one does not believe to exist. Could Dr. McAllister slander the Man in the Moon if he did not believe there were such a being? And yet is it not easily conceivable that in a country where the people believed in the Man in the Moon Dr. McAllister would be prosecuted for blasphemy if he argued against or ridiculed the attributes given to that mythical personage? The man, lawyer or preacher or editor, who asserts that the Rationalist makes a "willful and malicious attempt to lessen men's reverence of God by denying" the accuracy of other men's conceptions of him is foolish to the verge of imbecility, and when he pleads for a law to punish the "blasphemer," he is a criminal in intention, and lacks only the opportunity to be a criminal in fact. And yet these champions of violence have the audacity to say that to differ from them in opinion, to smile at ancient legends, and protest against savage creeds, is to sap "the foundations of society and of public order." "Society" must be kept as it is, though to prevent the expression of heresy involves the shedding of rivers of blood. "Public order" must be maintained, by which it is meant that the Christian majority must see to it that the expression of differing opinions be ruthlessly crushed out. That is what the church has always done when she had the necessary power, and that is what the theocrats will do in the United States if our people do not arouse themselves in time. The article we have quoted is fair notice of their desire and intention.

It is asserted that "the manifest and indisputable purpose" of THE TRUTH SEEKER "is to derogate from the character and attributes of God." That this is manifestly and indisputably false we have already shown; but supposing, for the sake of argument, it were true—what then? Who gave the Covenanter ministers authority to speak for God or to punish in his name? If, as they assert, he is infinite in knowledge and power, what do they suppose he cares for the adverse opinions of such comparatively microscopical creatures as Freethinkers, or needs of the assistance of such microbes as Christians? Do they think that he is going to burn us forever because we do not believe that the Bible tells the truth when it says that he ordered the indiscriminate slaughter of the Midianites, with the exception of the young women, who were given to the soldiers; or that he will thank them for insisting that he did order this and scores of other atrocities to be committed? It is merely a futile attempt to obscure the issue when these minister-editors asseverate that THE TRUTH SEEKER manifests "a venomous spite at the name that is above every name." They know that we have nothing to do with that name (if there is such a name) in itself considered; we are called to examine only the arguments and pretensions of the Christian apologists, and it is our ventilation of these that constitutes our "blasphemy" and makes THE TRUTH SEEKER "low, vile, and vulgar" in the sight of the theocrats. This paper is "vile" because it is "contumelious and profane"; that is, because it does not accept the authority of the Bible and its self-elected guardian, the church. But as to the charge of "vulgarity," radical difference of opinion does not excuse that. That assault is made to create prejudice against it in the minds of those who are not familiar with its character. THE TRUTH SEEKER is never vulgar, in which particular it presents a refreshing contrast to the Bible.

WHY THE TRUTH SEEKER IS HATED.

How desperately the Christian hates Freethought, and how perverted are his moral sentiments, is shown by the declaration of the Statesman and the Reformer that THE TRUTH SEEKER is "more outrageously shocking and more disastrous to the welfare of society," within the limit of its influence, than either the saloon, the desecration of Sunday, or gambling and lotteries. When even "Sabbath profanation" is ranked below THE TRUTH SEEKER in capacity to fit men for hell, we may begin to see ourselves as the theocrats see us and to anticipate the vengeance that will be meted out to us when the Sabbatarian has the satisfaction of his desires, for he has often informed the world that disregard of the Lord's Day will of itself bring down the merciless wrath of heaven upon this unhappy land.

This paper is not amenable to the Comstock postal law as it is, but there have been many attempts to incorporate in the law the word "disgusting," the bigots foreseeing that it would be easy then to get juries who would bring in a verdict against any Freethought paper; for to the average Christian all criticism of his beliefs is "disgusting," and he is so unfamiliar with or defiant of the principles of justice that he would be eager to suppress whatever did not suit his taste. If the friends of a free press and mails are not instantly vigilant, in season and out of season, the law will yet be made a drag-net for the capture of all classes of dissenters. "The movement in favor of ignorance" is pushed forward by men who are zealous, aggressive, and unscrupulous. They have no intention to be merciful to an unpopular minority, nor to concede the right of the Freethinker to propagate his views in his own way, as they demand and exercise untrammelled the right to propagate theirs. In fact, there is nothing to show that they would permit him to propagate his views in any way.

It is high testimony to the efficient work of THE TRUTH SEEKER that it has been selected by the theocrats as the especial object of their vengeance. This is not because we are more "blasphemous" than other Liberal papers in the United States, for we have not been more "contumelious and profane" than the rest, but it is because we have antagonized the theocrats' treasonable schemes persistently, systematically, and without exception. We have met them at every point and exposed their false pretenses and sophistical arguments. Until this time THE TRUTH SEEKER is the only Liberal paper that has shattered the "rest" mask of the Sabbatarians and forced them into the open to fight for Sunday laws frankly in the interest of the church. We have been alone in showing that in order to give the laborer a day of rest it is not necessary to enslave him and everyone else on Sunday. So far as our space and the information at hand would permit, we have kept our readers informed regarding the aggressions, attempted and accomplished, of the church and its allies. We have directly appealed to other Liberal papers to do likewise, but there has not been the intelligent and hearty co-operation that we expected and that the exigencies of the situation demanded. It is clear, therefore, that the theocrats have been quicker to perceive the tendency and effect of THE TRUTH SEEKER's work than have, in some instances, the Liberals themselves. But, as Patrick Henry said, we must hang together or hang separately. It is no longer altogether a question of Higher Criticism or of Jonah and the whale; and while not in any degree losing sight of the Rationalistic propaganda, it is very necessary that we—all of us—understand that there will soon be no liberty of propaganda of any kind unless we meet and check the organized forces of ecclesiasticism. This is not a holiday parade—not simply a question of now and then an article against the notion of Sunday sacredness. The vindictive attack upon THE TRUTH SEEKER by the Christian Statesman and Christian Reformer is the proof, if such proof were needed, that the campaign we have conducted for years has been and is effective.

It may be, indeed, that the "sentiment of the country is rising" for our suppression and that of "kindred moral evils"—such as spending Sunday as one prefers; it may be that "society shall be purged from the contamination" of our presence and that of other outspoken Freethinkers; but we wish to tell the Rev. Dr. McAllister that every flood-tide has its ebb, and that the church, triumphant as she seems to-day in the halls of legislation and in the police courts, possesses not a tithe of the absolute authority that was hers when she ruled Europe with thumbscrew and rack and stake. She of to-day must not be too sure that the world is hers. She can carry her insolence and cruelty too far for even the easy-going American. Our people have thought that church and state were two because the Constitution said they should be two, but some know better now, and more will on the morrow of the night when she sets herself seriously and without disguise to the suppression of heresy. After that she may not be even one, or one as the church is in Mexico, in France, and in Italy, the subject of the very civil power that she sought to use for the burlesquing of justice and the crushing of freedom. Let her beware; repulse will follow invasion as surely as men love liberty and hate slavery. Let her be content with the equal opportunity granted and guaranteed by the Constitution. More she has gotten by fraud, and more she still may get and hold for a time by fraud and force, but her triumph cannot last. The inevitable reaction will come, and then she will owe it only to the greater sense of justice in her foes if she retains even that which is rightfully hers. Let her remember the words of her own fetich book, that "pride goeth before destruction, and an haughty spirit before a fall."

"A new religion has been started in Hillsboro, Ill. Well, why not? This is a free country and Illinois suckers, dreamers, or frauds have as good a right to invent a new religion as Luther, Calvin, Henry VIII, or any of the other hundreds of inventors of the new religions that so abound."—Catholic Union and Times.

By an oversight excusable under the circumstances, Father Cronin omits to include in his list of inventors the artificers of the Christian religion and the patentees of the Roman division thereof.

T. De Witt Talmage says that the beauties of the ancient city of Corinth can be described, but that the beauties of heaven cannot be described. This is manifestly true, contrary to the rule in the case of Mr. Talmage's utterances. Corinth was a real city and there are some historical records pertaining to it; then what we lack of detail we can supply from our knowledge of other cities. On the other hand, we have no credible information regarding heaven. In a word, Corinth was on earth; heaven is in dreamland.

On August 29th William Conlin, a manufacturer, at Camden, N. J., tried to murder his son, who is his partner. "He says that he has received orders from God to kill his son and, while he is sorry that he must do so, he has to obey the divine ordinance." Is it probable that his insanity would have taken that form if he had not read the stories of Abraham's purposed sacrifice of his son Isaac and Jephthah's accomplished sacrifice of his daughter? Why do Christians praise Abraham for his great faith in and obedience to God and send William Conlin to the insane asylum? Who but the most superstitiously stupid believe that Abraham was any more under the guidance of God than is William Conlin? The New Jersey manufacturer talked with God just as much as did the Arab patriarch.

Cardinal Gibbons says that he is glad to see the Sunday law enforced in this city "because it is good for the law." Ah, then, it is for the law's sake that it is enforced? This explains what is meant by the demand for the enforcement of law "because it is law." The "law" can be kept in good health and spirits only by rigorously enforcing it. If it is allowed to fall into desuetude it pines and dies. However, there are those who say that the surest way to kill a bad law is to enforce it. Cardinal Gibbons, it seems, thinks that to enforce it is the best way to nourish and strengthen it, and we confess that we believe that he is right. That does appear to be the effect in a nation of fetich worshipers, where people imagine that law should override justice. We want no enforcement of Sunday statutes and similar enactments if enforcement is "good for the law." Human dignity and liberty require that such a course shall be pursued as will be bad for all laws of the kind.

Samuel P. Putnam landed in this city from the American line steamship Paris about nine o'clock last Sunday forenoon, September 15th. He is in splendid health and spirits, after his four months' campaigning in the United Kingdom. He likes the Freethinkers over there, says they all treated him excellently, and he hopes to see them again on their native heaths and will be greatly pleased to welcome any of them who may find their way to this side of the salt-water reservoir. What they thought of him and what kind of a "send-off" they gave him on the return voyage, may be judged from this report of his last meeting, which we quote from the London Freethinker of September 8th:

"Mr. S. P. Putnam delivered his farewell lecture at the Foresters' Hall on Sunday evening. Considering the wonderful weather, and the difficulty in organizing for a fresh meeting-place, there was a very gratifying attendance. Mr. Foote took the chair, and made a brief speech in introducing the lecturer. Mr. Putnam was accorded a most enthusiastic reception. He was in first-rate form, and his discourse was both instructive and entertaining. It was followed with close attention and evident pleasure. At the close our American visitor had quite an ovation, the audience cheering lustily and unanimously, many rising to their feet, the men waving hats and the ladies handkerchiefs. Mr. Foote wound up the proceedings with a farewell to the lecturer in the name of the Freethinkers of England. This elicited another outburst of applause, and the meeting came to an ideal conclusion, with plenty of hearty hand-shaking and fervent good-speeds."

Mr. Putnam will now devote his energies to the work of preparation for the Annual Congress of the Freethought Federation and American Secular Union, called to convene in this city on October 25th and continue in session three days. As all our readers know, Mr. Putnam is president of the joint association, and will be sure to do all he can to make the Convention a practical success and the national organization an immovable sea-wall against the in-rushing waves of theocracy. Let us all take hold and help him with earnest sympathy, with enlightened appreciation of the imperative demands of the hour, and with the pecuniary means for education and defense. Welcome home, Samuel P. Putnam, poet, orator, historian, and champion of equal liberty.

We strive to be courteous in debate and to avoid what might be called intemperance of language. But is it intemperate to call a liar a liar? It is this doubt that always makes it so much a matter of discretion, in dealing with the utterances of ministers, particularly when the ministers are engaged in attacks upon Infidels and Infidelity, whether the speakers shall be so characterized or not. They certainly commit with great frequency the offense which makes the term appropriate. The Kansas City (Mo.) Journal of September 9th has a condensed report of a sermon by the Rev. E. N. Allen, pastor of the First Cumberland Presbyterian church of that city, the subject being "Infidelity: Is it a Blessing or a Curse?" Here is a sample of his assertions:

"Outside the gates of Jerusalem, nineteen centuries ago, on a slight eminence, in appearance remarkably like a skull, a mob of Infidels and blasphemers murdered in cold blood an innocent Man. Of course, at the time they were worked up to a bent of fury, but it was in cold blood they laid their secret plans by which he was to be taken, condemned, and executed."

Could mendacity, even pulpit mendacity, be at once more stupid and malignant than that? Granting, for the argument's sake, the substantial accuracy of the gospel narrative of the accusation and death of Jesus, and there is in it not a single statement upon which to base the charge that the enemies of Jesus were Infidels or blasphemers. Not only were they not Infidels in the sense in which we now employ the term, but they were not infidels in the sense of disloyalty to or disbelief in the creeds of their time and country. They were orthodox Jews, anxious to preserve their inherited faith from the contamination of heresy. If there was an Infidel or blasphemer concerned in the tragedy, it was the victim, Jesus himself, and the Rev. Mr. Allen knows this perfectly well. All that he said on this point was a deliberate attempt to make use of the ignorant prejudices of his congregation for the purpose of intensifying their fear and hatred of the Infidel by making his skepticism retroactive in effect and therefore responsible for the murder of their "savior." There is no other possible explanation of the utterances of this minister, for to suppose that he has erred through ignorance or dullness is to suppose him actually imbecil, and it is not conceivable that such an incapable should occupy even a Cumberland Presbyterian pulpit.

An excitable and disconnected editor asserts that THE TRUTH SEEKER holds that a man who loathes intoxicants and tobacco loses sight of the "fundamental principle" of Liberalism. This is because we said in our remarks on the life and death of Professor Cook:

"Only once, so far as the knowledge of the writer of this extends, did he lose sight for a time of the fundamental principle, and that was when his intense loathing of intoxicants and tobacco led him to temporarily ally himself with the Prohibitionists."

Probably no person in the United States but the excitable and disconnected editor aforesaid has a thinking machine so out of gear as to permit him to torture out of that perfectly plain statement the affirmation that the man who is opposed to drinking alcoholic liquors and using tobacco is false to the fundamental principle of Liberalism. May not a person's intense feeling against a certain habit or belief lead him to advocate methods of antagonizing it that are contrary to the principles of the philosophy which he professes—and this without in the slightest degree discrediting the justifiableness of the feeling against such habit or belief? To say that the forcible suppression of the church would be a flagrant violation of the principles of Liberalism is not equivalent to saying that disbelief in church dogmas and hatred of church methods are incompatible with the acceptance of Liberalism. We have no more made an "argument for the liquor traffic" when protesting against sumptuary laws than we have made an argument for Catholicism when opposing proscription of Catholics, or Seventh-Day Adventism when we have denounced the persecution of Adventists. The simple truth is, this excitable and disconnected editor is so unfortunately organized that he cannot reason at all by comparison. Added to this the fact that not so very long since he tumbled helter-skelter into the Infidel and Prohibitionist propaganda without any previous acquaintance with the logical demands of Freethought and Liberalism, and we have an adequate explanation of his utter failure to understand that the Freethinker is the last man in the world who should advocate resort to the law for the curing of mental, moral, and social ills. Let the church have and retain the monopoly of proscription and persecution; she has been using those weapons for centuries, and by using them she has bungled and butchered every reform movement that has fallen under her baneful influence. Cannot the excitable and disconnected editor get even a glimmering and transient perception of the fact that veteran Liberals may venture to differ with him as to methods without being enemies of the improvements which he is vainly trying to advance by fury and force? He talks about anti-prohibitionists "encouraging the liquor traffic." If a law should be enacted imprisoning all preachers and we should oppose the law as contrary to the genius of Freethought and a cruel invasion of person, there is little doubt that he would rush into print with the assertion that we were "encouraging" Christianity. If he did not it would be because he finds it impossible to be consistent in his inconsistency.

A few weeks ago we sent notices to those of our subscribers who were indebted to us on their subscription account, and we are glad to say that a great many of them kindly responded with promptness. There are many, however, from whom we have as yet had no word, and to them we address these appealing remarks. We want some money, and want it badly, else we wouldn't say anything about it. But the cost of getting out the paper has to be paid regularly, and it takes a good deal of cash. So we again ask those whose time has expired to make an effort to renew their subscriptions now—at once—right off—so we can have the wherewithal to pay some bills that are due. We owe some people, other people owe us. If other people will pay us, we can pay some people; and then everybody will be happy. (Quod erat demonstrandum.) It is very unpleasant to be short of funds with a great deal more owed us than we owe, but that is our fix now, and hence this reminder to those who forgot to respond to the notice. We dislike to mention this matter, but Necessity has no fellowship with Squeamishness, and we have to do it. We need the money.

News and Notes.

I have the pleasure of another visit with Prof. Edwin Johnson, and this time we take a stroll over Hampstead Heath. This park is nearly as large as Central Park, and consists of hill, forest, and lakes, which present a charming variety. In fact, it seems more like being in the country on Hampstead Heath than in any other place I have visited in London. The views are wilder and more secluded. The air of cultivation is not so apparent. The neighborhood is both ancient and rural. There is the old hotel, and the chair in which Queen Victoria sat when she was a young lady and was in danger of an accident from restive horses on the steep Hampstead hill; and in this chair she recovered her nerves and equanimity. Since then the chair has been held sacred, and the tavern preserves its aristocratic dilapidation. Of course the thirsty traveler takes a glass of beer at this historic spot. Farther on are "The Spaniards" connected with the Lord Gordon riots, as depicted in Barnaby Rudge. We pass by the grove of pines amidst whose melodious songs Keats used to wander in his poetic youth, and it is certainly a beautiful spot. One can see far-off into the glowing country with its diversified sceneries, while opposite the busy city looms, and between are the pastures where blackberries used to grow and lovers still wander. Many a dream the poet might have had amidst these delicious and contrasting scenes. From one point on Hampstead Heath the city can be seen in almost its entire extent. This is one of the finest views that England can present. I shall still more remember the beauties of this place because, almost immediately after the visit, I came across the poem of James Thomson (B.V.) entitled, "A Sunday at Hampstead Heath," also "A Sunday up the River." I did not know that Thomson was so great a poet until I read those fresh and vigorous idyls. He has the ring of Burns, and the airy spaces of Shakespeare. He brings nature right before you, and pours forth the genuine human heart. I had read his "City of the Dreadful Night," and, while it is a marvelous poem, I did not like it. It is a kind of abnormal production, a gloomy curiosity of literature. But the "Sunday on Hampstead Heath" is gloriously healthful and jubilant, and, to my mind, ranks Thomson in essential genius with the greatest singers of the day. My visit to Hampstead Heath made me realize better the fidelity of this bard to nature's opulent display.

Professor Johnson is a scholar and a philosopher, both of fine literary insight and extensive reading. We talked on all manner of subjects along Hampstead Heath, and among his books. He is rich in experiences of the remarkable men of this era. Like myself he was compelled to give up his orthodox position and accept the perils of out-and-out heresy. He has been brave and true to his convictions. He has written a radical novel, "The Quest of Mr. East." I have not read it yet, but I have no doubt it is a suggestive work. It is not yet published. I hope, however, it will find its circle of readers. Professor Johnson has the pen of a felicitous writer.

Friday I take my way to Leicester, and Leicester is indeed a handsome place. It has a population of 180,000. It is a large manufacturing point, but its atmosphere is clear of smoke. The chimneys must consume their own smoke. The city fathers enforce this rule. If a chimney pours forth too much smoke there is a call at once for a halt of the columns, so that the city always presents a bright and clean appearance. Leicester is famous in the history of England. One of the ancient Earls of Leicester was the originator of the British parliament. Here are remnants of the old Roman wall, and the Roman Fosse, or public highway, is now one of the elegant streets of the city. There is King Richard's Road, along which Richard the Third galloped to Bosworth field, eight miles distant. At the bridge where he passed over is the inscription, "Near this spot are the remains of Richard the Third, the last of the Plantagenets." It is not known where his body was buried, if at all. Some say that it was thrown into the river and never recovered. I journey to Leicester on Friday in order to attend an "outing" of the employees of Mr. Sidney Gimson and Company, who have large manufacturing works at Leicester. Mr. Gimson is president of the Secular Society at Leicester, and is active in our cause. About four hundred men are employed at the company's works, and these, with their wives and sweethearts, made a rally of about six hundred excursionists. The British workers do not do anything by halves. They go in for a whole day of fun when they set about it, and enjoy themselves from morning till night. We start off before 7 o'clock A.M. A special train of fifteen cars is chartered for the occasion. These are filled full; even the babies join in the festivities and don't seem to get tired. Our destination is Skegness, a watering-place in Lincolnshire, about seventy miles off. On our way we pass through old Boston, the original of Massachusetts Boston. The Puritans came from here, and the Pilgrims from Plymouth. A grim sect were the Puritans, and armed with authority. Old Boston has something the appearance of its namesake. You might imagine yourself in a part of the "Hub" as you roam its ancient streets. It used to be the third seaport in England, ranking after London and Bristol. London has maintained its supremacy, but the glory of Bristol and Boston has departed. Other cities have rushed to the front. The parish church at Boston is one of the largest in the kingdom, larger than any in New England, I think. It has a noble tower, which is called the "Stump," for, as you approach the city, especially in the evening, it has the appearance of a huge stump, rising above the surrounding dwellings. It is massive, and, as you view it nearer, beautiful in its structure. It is a notable landmark. Boston has a population now of about 15,000. It has some shipping and manufacturing business. The country around is level, and rich in agriculture.

We also pass by Belvoir Castle, pronounced "Beaver," the seat of the Duke of Rutland. It is, I understand, a French word, meaning "beautiful sight," and certainly there must be an extensive view from its lofty battlements. It is on a high hill clothed with forests, the highest elevation in the county, from which a vast and level expanse stretches, mostly of prosperous farms. The railroad extends through what are called the "fens," which were once swamps, incapable of cultivation, but have been drained, canals and huge pumps being used for this purpose, and now the landscape shines with harvest. Thousands of acres have thus been utilized. We reach Skegness about half-past nine, and to the music of the band we march to the pavilion, and the broad and shining beach, miles in length, over which the children rush with joyous excitement, and the older folks follow, equally interested in the ever-varying panorama of sea and shore. The children take off their shoes and stockings and paddle barefoot along the sands and incoming waters, and it is interesting to watch their maneuvers. They enjoy it with the recklessness of childhood. Some of the elders take to the bathing machines, some to the boats, and some sail over the tide on the yacht or steamship. It is a checked scene on every hand. A long pier stretches out into the ocean, upon which the band plays, and various entertainments attract for ten continuous hours. There is a "switch-back," and although this was invented in America, and ran its course at the World's Fair, I had to come to Skegness in order to take my first ride, which was an exhilarating affair, something like coasting down hill. Various games are advertised, shooting the cocoa-nut, etc. The negro minstrels put in their fun, and altogether there is a wide and resounding effervescence of jollity. The tide is somewhat insidious along these sands, and creeps inward before one is aware, and the loiterer is shut off from the mainland by an ever-broadening stream, and the way people clamber over that watery barrier is somewhat amusing to those who are safe on the other side. At one o'clock sharp is the dinner hour, and we all gather promptly in the vast pavilion, and in true democratic fashion proceed to the consumption of a "good, square meal," with a pint of beer attached. The British workman has a good appetite, and eats vigorously, and when he gets through he proceeds at once to the open firmament of heaven, and takes a smoke. He does not wait to listen to speeches, as we do in America. Everybody, so far as I can see, is satisfied, sober, contented, and happy. The afternoon pursues its glorious march. The mists of morning disappear, the sky is almost cloudless, and the brilliant sea and the vast, level shores, glimmering into distant silver, make a resplendent picture. Out on the smooth water one can hear the music of the band, mellowed into wondrous harmony by the beaming distance, while a million waves break along the strand and join their voices to the sweeping melody. Even the donkeys seem to have an ear for music, and trot jubilantly along, with the little children shouting and laughing on their backs. The silvery afternoon slowly changes into golden twilight. More beautiful appears the ocean, now almost like a mirror. The sails are drooping and the boats are lazily floating. The children are tired, but trudge sturdily onward. The crowd gathers at the station, and at 8.05 P.M. we start for home through the broad and glistening night. The earth hath its electric stars, answering to the stars above, as we thunder through the cities, villages, and fields. At eleven o'clock we arrive at Leicester, and of all the joyous crowd only one man is left behind to pay the penalty of too much "income-tax" on the brain. It was a regular British holiday, and I enjoyed every moment of the breezy entertainment. It was a delightful "water-sketch" of Merrie England.

The Gimson company paid the expenses of this big picnic, the railroad fare of all the men, and provided the excellent dinner, and they did this with no patronizing airs, but in the true spirit of liberty, fraternity, and equality. They are genuine men, and appreciate the manhood of the worker.

I suppose right here I might give some of my impressions of the British workingman and his conditions. Of course I have not had time to study the matter thoroughly, but I have learned many things. I used to think that the position of the workingman in this country was not much better than slavery, and the sooner he could emigrate to America and "go West," the better. As far as I can see, the position of the workingman here is fully as good as in America. He may not receive as much for his labor, but then it does not cost so much to live. Rents and clothing of all kinds are much less than in America. I can buy as good a suit of clothes here for $7 as I can for $15 in New York or Chicago. Shoes that cost $10 in America are only $5 here, and so on. You can get a shave for 3 cents in London that costs 10 cents in New York, and 25 cents in the Far West. Luxuries, however, are not much cheaper. Restaurant living in London is fully as expensive as in New York, Chicago, or San Francisco. They have a fashion here of charging for everything. You have the impression at first glance of the menu that you get your steak or chop at a less price than at home; but you have to pay extra for potatoes and other vegetables, for bread, butter, napkin, and also two and three pennies for attendance, so that by the time you finish you have paid even more than in New York. You cannot get a good meal in London short of 50 cents, and it is more often a dollar if you are extra hungry. I think, however, that the materials for home living throughout England are much cheaper than in America; and if you get into out-of-the-way places, off the line of travel and fashion, you are surprised at the abundance, goodness, and cheapness of the living.

I am therefore satisfied from observation and the reports of those who should be well informed that the workingman is pecuniarily as well off in England as in America.

The British workingman is intelligent and independent. To a certain extent he has won his rights. He is not by any means the "under dog." His power is respected. There is getting to be a good understanding between employer and employed. They are finding out that both are made of the same stuff; both are human beings, with the same interests and the same world to live in. The old feeling of antagonism and distrust is disappearing. Of course there are strikes, with more or less bigotry on one side, and selfishness on the other; but arbitration is generally resorted to, and justice prevails. Wrongs exist, but enlightenment and improvement are on the gain, and the rights of labor are more and more acknowledged. This, mainly by voluntary co-operation, and not by any interference of the state.

The British workman takes things easier than the American. The American works faster; he will get more out of a machine, and of course gets greater wages. But if he works faster, he also spends faster; and even if he takes a holiday, he still "rustles" and hurries through his pleasure as if time were short. But the British workman will take his time. He doesn't hurry. He enjoys life as he goes along. He is tranquil. He makes the most of his holidays. He gets all out of them he can. He doesn't seem to make it a business to be happy, as the American does. He simply is happy with a jolly complacency. He makes no fuss about it. The workmen don't labor hard in England, so far as the factories are concerned. They have for holidays Sundays, half-Saturdays, and generally half-Wednesdays or Thursdays. They begin work at six in the morning, breakfast from eight to half-past, work from that time to one, dinner from one to two, and then quit work at five. It strikes me that this arrangement breaks up the monotony of labor better than the custom in America.

While much is yet to be accomplished, I feel that labor in England has made magnificent progress, and its vast results are not going into the hands of the few. Wealth is on the road to equitable distribution. The principle of co-operation, as I have before noted, has been developed with wonderful success in Great Britain. An International Co-operative Congress is now being held in London, whose sessions I have attended. At the meeting yesterday, when George Jacob Holyoake, the father of the co-operative movement in England, was introduced by the chairman as of "Great Britain and the world generally," it was stated that in Great Britain there were no less than 1,700 co-operative stores. Enrolled in the ranks are a million and a quarter of members, carrying on a trade of $250,000,000 a year, with a profit of $25,000,000 a year. About $200,000 were spent in education, and $90,000 in charities. I am glad to hear from Mr. Holyoake that from the beginning there has been no question of the full equality of woman. She has been shareholder, and received the profits as a man. There is a Woman's Guild connected with the movement, for the education of woman, not only in domestic but in social and universal life, while woman endears the home and also wields the "basket power," that is, the marketing power. Yet she is not simply for the home, but for all the world, side by side with man.

It must be noted that these vast results have been achieved by voluntary co-operation, not by State Socialism. The interference of the state in such matters would not only be useless, but injurious.

Sunday morning, with my host, Mr. Gimson, and his little son Humphrey, five years old, I wander over the stately Abbey Park of Leicester. The old ruined abbey is near by, though not in the park itself. In this Abbey Cardinal Woolsey died, and, I believe, was buried. Only the walls are standing of the once grand structure. The sunshine flouts it, as fortune flouted the poor cardinal himself. The people of Leicester who do not attend church come to the park to enjoy the Sunday, and the young folks make love, and it presents quite a pastoral scene.

In the afternoon I make acquaintance with the Secular Society of Leicester. First of all we have a splendid sociable time. We gather around the tables, over one hundred of us, in all. There is a delegation of eight good comrades from Derby, and another friend travels thirty miles on his bicycle to attend the first Freethought lecture of his life. Music adds its charms to the festal hour. Nobody says grace, but before we partake of the tea and bread and cake the orchestra pours forth its animating strains.

It is certainly a great pleasure to satisfy the hunger to "the Dorian mood of flutes and soft recorders." It adds to the conversational ability of the occasion, and we don't eat so fast. After the tables were pretty well cleared of the delicacies, and the tea which "cheers, but not inebriates" had permeated the chambers of the brain, the chairman, in the name of the Secular Society, gave a warm and generous welcome to the American visitor, to which he responded with cordial good will. The party then adjourned to the club-rooms, reading-room, and library until half-past six o'clock, the hour for the evening service, at which I gave my lecture on "Christianity and Woman." The hall was filled. It was one of the best audiences that I have greeted in England. There was music by the choir, which was excellent every way. I was cheered by the animating surroundings of this Leicester campaign.

I have much to say of this Leicester Secular Society. It has a noble record, of small beginnings, of struggles and of brilliant victory. The building in which the society now meets is about as large as the Paine Memorial Hall, Boston. It is a handsome structure on one of the best streets of Leicester, with ample accommodations for improvement and pleasure.

The origin of this society dates back to 1840. A Discussion Class was held in the Mechanics' Institution, originated and animated by George Bown, one of the advanced thinkers of that time. Among the young men who gathered about him was Josiah Gimson, the father of Sidney A. Gimson. The subjects brought forward in the class soon became the talk of the town. Afterwards a school was carried on during the week, with lectures on the Sunday. A library was also formed. The social and Secular views of progressive thinkers were discussed, and Leicester thus had the opportunity of listening to new thoughts. Out of this evolving institution, which, having no creed, readily adapted itself to circumstances, in May, 1873, was organized the Secular Hall Company, and the site of the present hall was purchased. In 1881 the hall was completed from designs of W. Larnier Sugden, and opened on the first Sunday in March. A large number of notable Freethinkers were present from all parts of England. The property now pays an income of six per cent on the investment. Secular, social, political, and religious advocates are welcome to its platform, provided they submit their views to criticism and debate. A long list of illustrious names adorns its record. Among them I must mention James Thomson (B.V.), who contributed a poetic address at the opening of the hall. I must quote a few lines, for they show the vigorous Atheism of the poet, whom I have already referred to as a genius of high order:

Lo, all the lands wherein our wandering race
Hav led their flocks, or fixed their dwelling-place,
To till with patient toil the fruitful sod,
Abound with altars to the Unknown God
Or Gods, whom man created from of old,
In his own image, one yet manifold,
And ignorantly worshiped. We now dare,
Taught by millenniums of barren prayer,
Of mutual scorn and hate and bloody strife,
With which these dreams have poisoned our poor life,
To build our Temples on another plan,
Devoting them to God's creator, Man;
Not to Man's creature, God. And thus, indeed,
All men and women, of whatever creed,
We welcome gladly if they love their kind;
No other valid test of worth we find,
Who loveth not his brother at his side,
How can he love a dim dream deified?

Another name must be added to this extraordinary list, that of Professor Huxley, who placed himself among the supporters of the society. An appeal being made for funds, he wrote, Feb. 12, 1891:

Mr. Huxley incloses a small contribution to the special fund of the Leicester Secular Society in evidence of his full sympathy with the objects of the society.

To a request for permission to publish the above he replied:

You are quite at liberty to use my note, and I shall be glad if it is of any service. I am,
Yours very faithfully, T. H. HUXLEY.

This record, it seems to me, places Huxley in square accord with the principles of Secularism.

The importance and far-reaching nature of the Leicester movement will thus be understood. In Leicester, as in Failsworth, we see that, give Secularism a fair field, it will show its true adaptation to humanity. It will satisfy, not perhaps a "believer," but anyone who is willing to accept the truth and do his duty.

In the hall are the portraits of Charles Bradlaugh, George Jacob Holyoake, and Josiah Gimson. The name and fame of the latter cannot be forgotten in the history of this society. He was one of its founders, and a most ardent and generous supporter. At his death, in 1883, he bequeathed, in maintenance of the Institution, an income of one hundred pounds for ten years.

I am cordially entertained during my stay at Leicester by Mr. and Mrs. Sidney A. Gimson, and I must thank them for the delightful and instructive hours I spent in this beautiful city, where I had an opportunity to see so much of progressive English life. I cannot name all the Secular friends I met here. They are many. I shall not forget the generosity of their reception. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

The Mask Dropped.

THEOCRATIC PAPERS DEMAND THE LEGAL SUPPRESSION OF "THE TRUTH SEEKER."

From the Christian Reformer and the Christian Statesman.

A few issues since we referred to THE TRUTH SEEKER, of New York, as containing week after week "blasphemous language and still more blasphemous pictures." This charge, which is very mildly put, considering the character of the paper in question, has called forth a long editorial in reply. The substance of this reply is in the denial that the language and pictures referred to are immoral. Says the editor: "THE TRUTH SEEKER has not degraded the morals of its readers. It has advocated the use of the reason in the examination of the creeds of all the churches of the world; it has protested against teaching to the children of the land the monstrous falsehood that the crimes recorded in the Bible, and there attributed to Yahveh, were commanded by a god infinit in power and justice; it has shown that the devastations of nature are inconsistent with the ethics of civilized man, and it has demanded that all citizens be equal before the law, regardless of their belief or unbelief. There is nothing immoral in this, nothing calculated to make one man invade the rights of any other man. If the editor of the Christian Reformer cannot see this we are not responsible; we cannot engage to clear his brain of theological cobwebs; he is joined to his idols."

Of course the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER and all that school see nothing of immorality in the blasphemies against God and Christ with which that sheet every week abounds. But what is the view which the recognized authorities in criminal law take of such matters? These authorities generally define blasphemy as "consisting in speaking evil of the deity, with an impious purpose to derogate from the divine majesty, and to alienate the minds of others from the love and reverence of God. It is purposely using words concerning the supreme being calculated and designed to impair and destroy the reverence, respect, and confidence due to him as the intelligent creator, governor, and judge of the world. It embraces the idea of detraction as regards the character and attributes of God, as calumny usually carries the same idea when applied to an individual. It is a willful and malicious attempt to lessen men's reverence of God by denying his existence or his attributes as an intelligent creator, governor, and judge of men, and to prevent their having confidence in him as such. Contumelious reproaches and profane ridicule of Christ or the holy scriptures have the same evil effect in sapping the foundations of society and of public order and are classed under the same head." (See Judge Cooley's Constitutional Limitations, pp. 472, 473. See also the definitions of Chief Justice Shaw, of Massachusetts, in 20, Pickering's Reports, 213, 216; Chancellor Kent, of New York, in 8 Johnson's Reports, 295-96; Justice Duncan, of Pennsylvania, in 11 Sergeant and Rawle, 394-409; Justice Story, of the Supreme Court of the United States, in 2 Howard's Reports, 198; Bouvier's and Burrill's Law Dictionaries, under the word "Blasphemy"; Wharton's Criminal Law, vol. i, §36; vol. ii, §2542; Bishop's Criminal Law, vol. ii, §76.)

The above are only a few of the standard authorities that might be quoted on this point. They disagree on a few points, but they agree in the main. And the chief point on which all agree is this, that blasphemy is a crime against the state, and that it "saps the foundations of society and of public order." It is thus an offense against the public morals and consequently against the public welfare, and ought to be suppressed by the strong arm of the law.

Judged by the laws and the decisions of the courts of our country, are the discussions and pictures of the paper in question blasphemous and immoral, or are they not? Our courts say that "contumelious reproaches and profane ridicule of Christ and the Holy Scriptures" are blasphemy; and that they have the evil effect "of sapping the foundations of society and of public order." And we do not hesitate to affirm that there never were more contumelious reproaches and profane ridicule of Christ than are paraded week after week in this blasphemous sheet. Its editor may assert that its discussions and illustrations are in the realm of lawful controversy among learned disputants, and therefore justified under the decisions of our courts, which have been careful to state that "they did not intend to include in blasphemy disputes between learned men upon particular controverted points. The constitutional provisions for the protection of religious liberty not only include within their protecting power all sentiments and professions concerning or upon the subject of religion, but they guarantee to every one a perfect right to form and to promulgate such opinions and doctrines upon religious matters, and in relation to the existence, power, attributes, and providence of a Supreme Being as to himself shall seem reasonable and correct. In doing this he acts under an awful responsibility, but it is not to any human tribunal." (Cooley's Constitutional Limitations, pp. 474, 475.)

The man who draws the shocking pictures of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and the publisher who scatters them broadcast over our country, certainly act under an awful responsibility to a higher than any human tribunal. It makes us tremble under the sense of this awful responsibility, as well as fills us with unutterable disgust, every time we see the caricatures of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ and of God the Father, the manifest purpose of which is "to lessen men's reverence of God" or to deny "his existence or his attributes as an intelligent Creator, Governor, and Judge of men, and to prevent their having confidence in him as such." The malignity of the impious purpose stands out in the baldest manner. As the definition of blasphemy states it, it is on the very face of it "an impious purpose to derogate from the divine majesty, and to alienate the minds of others from the love and reverence of God." Do not the souls of these blasphemers shudder when they think of their awful responsibility to a tribunal, not human, before which they shall one day stand? Or are they so hardened that they will make a mockery of this appeal to their immortal nature and eternal interests?

But by the very definition of blasphemy this sheet should be called to account before a human tribunal. Its manifest and indisputable purpose is to derogate from the character and attributes of God; its every issue is low, vile, vulgar, and grossly contumelious and profane in its reproaches and ridicule of Christ and the Holy Scriptures. The effect of its circulation can be nothing else, therefore, than to corrupt the public morals and sap the foundations of society and public order. And if our courts and the supervisors of our mail service would do their duty in protecting the good order of the state, maintaining the public morals, and supporting the very foundations of society, the blasphemous publication would be promptly suppressed. And sooner or later it will be suppressed.

The saloon is a corrupter of public morals and saps the foundations of society. So does the desecration of the day of rest and worship. So do gambling resorts and lotteries of every kind. The sentiment of the country is rising for the suppression of all these and other kindred moral evils. Some of these are already under legal ban. More outrageously shocking and more disastrous to the welfare of society than any of them, so far as its impious influence extends, is this weekly paper with its venomous spite at the name that is above every name, and that to the best of men and women is as ointment poured forth. At that name every knee shall yet bow and every tongue confess, and then shall laws against blasphemy be enforced, and society shall be purged from the contamination of all such contumelious and profane publications.

Apart from its blasphemy it is unfit for decent society. We cannot understand why the post-office authorities of New York city, or the Society for the Suppression of Vice and Immorality, do not compel the publishers to change the character of the paper or suppress it as an enemy of public morals and the nation's weal.

Probably one of the chief reasons why this publication has been permitted to go unchallenged by public officers and courts, and by the Society for the Suppression of Vice, is the fear of giving it greater notoriety and thus increasing its circulation. Reputable journals generally are silent as to its blasphemies, doubtless for the same reason. It is possible that the publishers would welcome the advertising that would come by a criminal prosecution. And they may hope quite confidently for a wider circulation through the very notoriety that would come by the exclusion of their papers from the mails. For our part, we see but one thing to be done in the interest of good order and the welfare and safety of the state. And that is, let the law against blasphemy in New York, clear and explicit as it is, be rigidly enforced. And that would mean not only the exclusion of the paper from the mails but the prohibiting of the printing and publishing of it as well.

What must the constituency of such a journal be? To many an office, as to our own, it comes in exchange. And even in making note of it, as we do of other offenses against good morals, as a necessary duty for the welfare of the public, we are often constrained to turn from it with abhorrence. But there must be a large number of subscribers on whom this paper depends for its support, and to whom its fetid pollution must possess all the attraction of a savory and appetizing meal. It was a sad thought as well as a keen thrust when Colonel Stone said in the committee room at Washington: "I have only received four objections to this [the Christian Amendment], and two of these were written from a lunatic asylum." But it is a far sadder view of the case to think of the publishers and readers of this paper as men and women, too (O, the unspeakable perversion of womanhood to be in such a company), with the gift of reason and many high mental endowments, delighting in this weekly exponent of profanity and blasphemy. The greatest boon the civil power could confer on them would be to cut off their supply of congenial pabulum and thus induce them to seek something more wholesome both mentally and morally.

Observations.

The American liner, City of Paris, which arose above the eastern horizon last Saturday with the Secular Pilgrim, Mr. S. P. Putnam, on board, had been pretty severely jostled by the old Atlantic. She had parted a pump-rod or some other gilguy, and was forty hours late. Moreover, she had on board a clergyman with a broken leg, the work of an enormous wave that came over the bow when she was two days out and swept the vessel from stem to stern. That the shot was intended for Putnam there is reason to believe, and that it failed through bad marksmanship is apparent. The Secular Pilgrim was below at the time, and was somewhat disappointed, upon coming on deck and learning that a clergyman had been injured, to find that it was a Unitarian instead of a Presbyterian. Mr. Clarence S. Darrow, of Chicago, got caught in the rush and piled up alongside Mayor Hopkins of the windy city and forty others, but his unbelieving bones were miraculously preserved.

We are all glad to see Putnam home again, and with him rejoice that he escaped from England before the strained relations between this country and that, over the late yacht races, could lead to a massacre of Americans in the streets of London.

I am invited by the editor of a Prohibition paper to enter with him into a discussion of the subject of the suppression of the liquor traffic. I am unanimous in declining the invitation. I am opposed to legal prohibition on the ground that the sale of liquor is not an act of aggression against the liberty of any citizen. I am familiar with the reasons offered by the Prohibitionists in extenuation of their invasive propaganda, but know of none that touches the issue. Only the deleterious effects of liquor drinking are discussed, and they are conceded. Concerning them I am as liberal with concessions as the Western candidate upon whom a personal attack had been made. He admitted for the argument's sake that he was confirmed in habits of gluttony, intemperance, and concupiscence; also that he had been twice hanged for horse-stealing back in the states before ever he came West; but he held that in dwelling so much on these or kindred points his opponents were guilty of the fallacy in logic termed mistaking the issue, or ignoratio elenchi; the cause on trial, he maintained, was the soundness of his political principles and whether he should be elected.

Were this writer to discuss the liquor situation, his remarks would not be directed to the question of suppressing the traffic, but would be addressed, rather, to an inquiry where the politicians acquired the authority to place upon it such restrictions as they have already imposed. I am unable to recognize their right to raise the price of liquor by imposts, taxes, and license fees. Talking about whisky trusts, the biggest and most voracious liquor trust is the United States government, which, by mulcting both producer and dealer, doubles the cost of the commodity to the consumer. We have a liquor problem to-day because parties other than those who manufacture, vend, or buy have unwarrantably interfered, and the elimination of these is its solution. There ought to be no liquor question except whether one will drink or decline.

"We see," says the Boston Investigator, "that the management of the A. P. A. is evidently being absorbed by the Protestant church." It may be, though, that this is merely a return to the original source, and that it is not so much the management that is being absorbed as the mist of false pretense which has hitherto obstructed our vision. What else but the Protestant church is interested in bouncing the Catholics out of the red school-house and chucking that structure full of Bibles to the ridge-pole?

Is there anything in the Constitution of the Trades Unionists that exempts a church from the general operation of the laws of labor which in their wisdom they have framed? In this city, the Episcopalians are building a cathedral at a cost of ten millions or less, and all the workmen engaged in its construction are non-unionists. With this fact agitating his mind, the walking delegate of the Plumbers' Union proposed to the walking delegates of the Building Trades Unions that a strike should be ordered on the spot. But the sacrilege was not consummated. Up rose a delegate from some other union and protested. "It would be a damned shame," said he, "to strike on a place of worship. We can't profane its sacred precincts by a strike." By which consideration the other delegates were awed, and no strike was ordered.

This is instructive, as intimating where "Labor" will be found on questions affecting the interests of the church. Why did not the Labor delegates propose that the allied unions present the cathedral with a memorial window? Such a window, bearing this inscription from Lowell's "Parable," would serve to keep a pertinent query before the worshippers:

Have you founded your thrones and altars, then,
On the bodies and souls of living men?
And think ye that building shall endure
Which shelters the noble and crushes the poor?

"God, who knows all things, knows whether I am guilty or not." Such is the language of Mary Alice Almont Livingston, accused of causing, on August 30th, the death by poison of her mother, Mrs. M. Evelyn Bliss, a late resident of New York. As very little direct evidence is obtainable in the case, there is likely to be a miscarriage of justice unless this repository of important information is subpoenaed. If what Mrs. Livingston says about his familiarity with the facts is true, he would be the star witness.

Item of news from Catholic Mexico: A number of Catholic missionaries went to Penon Blanc, state of Durango, recently, to labor among the operatives of a cotton mill. Discovering that many of the hands had been married only by civil law, the missionaries threatened them with excommunication if they did not get married again by the church. This has had the result of breaking up many families, the women getting rattled and going back to their parents. Upon those who surrendered, a penance was inflicted, and they were made to walk in a public procession with halters on their necks and heavy crosses on their backs.

There are people in Mexico who threaten the missionaries with prosecution, but it does not seem that those poor devils are altogether responsible. The penance they impose on the Mexican peons are only hempen and wooden figures of the less desirable "spiritual" halters and crosses that all Christians affect to glory in. The milk in this particular cocoanut is that through civil marriages the church loses the enormous fees she charges for consecrating conjugal unions. As marriage by priests is an invention of the Christian church and has resulted in much profit, it is no wonder the Catholic clergy claim it as a sacrament. Everything with a dollar in it—birth, baptism, christening, confirmation, marriage, more births, christenings, etc., indulgences, absolution, unction, funerals, purgatorial deliverances—the whole of these and perhaps some things I have forgotten to enumerate, are bound as by an umbilical cord to the vitals of the church. And the dollar makes them sacraments.

The late William Henry Hurlbert was a poet as well as a distinguished journalist. He sang thus cheerfully:

Giv thanks to God for infants damned,
Doomed from their birth to endless flames;
The vaults of hell with such are crammed,
And Satan only knows their names.

Their wicked parents would not heed
The mild commandment of the Lord;
Therefore their unbaptized seed
By him most justly are abhorred.

In these days, when political action has taken the place of the Christian life, and when hypocrisy is accepted as an adequate substitute for belief, those lines have the jibe of satire and the snicker of irreverent mirth. They are orthodox, though, and would have been set to music in the "Pilgrim's Harp" had they appeared contemporaneously with the Rev. Michael Wiggleworth's paean, "Hell is crammed with infants damned, without a day of grace."

If the Protestant missionaries who fled from the scenes of disorder in China to the security of Shanghai had not been burdened with the care of women and children, they might have stayed at their posts to encourage their neophytes to suffer for conscience' sake and to lay down their own lives for Christ. As it is, they have loved their wives and their babies more than Him, and sacrificed the opportunity of martyrdom in order to take their families to a place of safety.—Catholic Review.

That rather than have their own and their families' throats cut the Protestant missionaries took to their heels may show that they "loved their wives and babies better than Him;" but, on the other hand, the failure of "Him" to protect his agents shows that He loves his ease better than Them. He always lets the devil take the hindmost. The necessity of flight seldom overtakes the Catholic missionary, who at the approach of danger may seek the seclusion afforded by the petticoat of some native female. Keeping on the best of terms with the women of the heathen is one of the forms of martyrdom which he is most often called upon to endure, and the alacrity with which he has accepted the issue has been as effectual in sacrificing the opportunity of martyrdom as the flight of the uxorious Protestant. What is needed by both kinds of missionaries is that their God should get a move on him and take measures for the safety of his ambassadors. His habitual neglect in this matter brings him under the reprobation of St. Paul, who advances the proposition that anyone who fails to provide for his own has denied the faith and is worse on the whole than an infidel.

This excerpt is from the report of a ministerial conference in Seattle, Wash. I borrow the word excerpt from Mr. E. C. Walker, who thinks he will not need it this week. The report is sent me by a correspondent:

When A. J. Hanson, of Puyallup, arose to present his report, he said he had some good news from that great hop country. The hop crop, the main support of the people, was a failure; the crop had been cursed by God.

Bishop Bowman: "The hops have not grown?"

Dr. Hanson: "They have grown, but have been cursed by the hop louse."

Bishop Bowman: "Good."

And from all over the room voices could be heard giving utterance to the fervent ejaculation: "Thank God."

It is wonderful that the Almighty should blast so desirable a thing as hops and yet permit the crop of clerical jackasses to bloom and mature so abundantly in the Puget Sound country, but his ways are past finding out. In California the same bray is to be heard when grapes are short, though the year's great corn yield causes them no sadness. The Washington ministers are not worried in especial over the prospect of hard times following the failure of the principal resource of the farmers in the White river valley, for they are aware that the church gets fat on famine. They probably know also that over-stimulation leads to remorse, often followed by contrition, conversion, and contribution, and that with plenty of whisky in sight the population can switch off onto that beverage without diminishing the receipts. If these clergymen have not thanked God for the demonetization of silver and the ruin of the mining industries of the state, involving a smaller consumption of the hop product, it is because they have not thought of it in that light.

My correspondent expresses astonishment that love of God should so constrict the bowels of men that they can be thankful for the failure of their neighbors' harvest. What, then, will he think of the people at a camp-meeting in Macon, Ga., who prayed that the same or an identical God would use his power to prevent the arrival of a trainload of excursionists who proposed to dance for their own amusement, and who—that is, the camp-meeting savages—accepted the wrecking of the train as an answer to their prayer, and praised heaven for the dispensation?

The conclusion I reach is that what is called the love of God in a man is a miraculous negative development of the faculty of minding his own business. GEO. E. MACDONALD.

Light or Night.

THERE SHALL BE LIGHT.

There shall be light for him who bravely breasts
The steep ascent of knowledge e'er before him;
Each upward step illumines some lesser crests,
Though still the summit casts its shadow o'er him.

There shall be light for all who boldly press
Onward and upward, trusting reason's guiding,
In search of truth, no matter if in dress
Of fable, myth, or creed 'tis found abiding.

There shall be light so far as human kind
May struggle upward toward the summit lit
By cause beyond the grasp of finite mind—
Th' incomprehensible, the infinit.

THERE SHALL BE NIGHT.

There shall be night for those content to plod,
In ruts worn cycles deep by pagan travel,
In search of that great mystery called God,
Which finite minds may never here unravel.

There shall be night where unsupported faith
Assumes control, and, stifling voice of reason,
The finite worm presumes to say God saith,
And asking evidence is deemed high treason.

There shall be night where priestly powers o'erride
The civil law, and war 'gainst conscience rages;
Aye, night as dark as that which occupied
That Christian era known as the dark ages.

Raining Puritanism.

The old Puritan Sabbath is going fast. The old Blue Laws are passing away or sinking into deserved disrepute. —Kansas City Star.

The Star would remind you of the fellow in the tree who hailed the ark as it floated by and asked to be taken aboard. His request being refused, he told Noah to sail on with his old scow, he didn't think there was going to be much of a shower anyhow. The fact is, it is raining Puritanism all over the country, with a pretty good prospect for a regular deluge. Wichita is all afloat. Atchison and Kansas City are under water, and in every part of the state the people are fleeing to the hills and tree-tops.

And Sunday-law Puritanism in on a rampage all over the United States. It is more alive and aggressive than at any time for a hundred years. The Puritans are thoroughly organized, and last winter succeeded in several states in passing new Puritan laws. Every state has its Puritan code, and with the aid of Comstock, Blair, and others, the United States has, during the last fifteen years, added quite a good-sized Puritan code to its repertory of law.

Only three months ago Massachusetts enacted that: "Whoever is present at a game of sport, a play, or any public diversion except a concert of sacred music on the Lord's day, shall be fined $5." For participating, the fine is $50. For being the manager of said sport, play, or diversion, $500. For keeping open a place of business, $50.

This looks a good deal as if "the old Puritan Sabbath is going fast"! A fine of $5 for merely looking at "a game of sport, a play, or any public diversion." At this rate of "going fast," it will soon be a crime to wink or brush a fly off your nose on Sunday. Several state supreme courts, as also the United States Circuit court, have recently sustained the Puritan laws. The latter court, in the case of R. M. King, who has since died, charged with the crime of keeping Saturday instead of Sunday, held that the United States Constitution did not guarantee religious liberty as against state laws.

Of course this is not good law construction of the Constitution, but it is good enough for Adventists, who haven't very many votes.

Public Opinion, a neutral New York journal, says:

It is in reality a national struggle that has been entered upon in this city. This is equally evident from whichever point of view we look at it, whether as advocates of the strictly religious, Puritan Sunday, or of the European, holiday Sunday. Unless all signs fail, the contest will prove one of the greatest and bitterest in the history of our country.

The Star is simply whistling to keep up its courage. —Evening Standard, Leavenworth, Kan.

Our Missionary Work.

Several of our good friends have written us that in their opinion the work, "Self-Contradictions of the Bible," should go along with Paine's "Age of Reason" as a missionary pamphlet. Mr. J. R. Perry puts it thus: "As a missionary document the 144 Self-Contradictions will go hand in hand with the 'Age of Reason.' I think any person getting the one will get the other. It is the grubbing process, clearing out the roots and stones, necessary to preparing the soil for good seeds of common sense." And as it is our delight to furnish the implements for this sort of agricultural operations, we are willing to do our part and will send the "Self-Contradictions of the Bible" to those who will distribute it among their Christian friends, FOR A DOLLAR A DOZEN. Or we will send twelve copies to as many different addresses for one dollar.

Now let the friends of Freethought turn to and circulate "Self-Contradictions" as well as the "Age of Reason." Send both books out by the thousand and watch the result. Flood the country with them, and let the Christians know what their holy paper fetich, the Bible, is like and why it is worthless as a guide to any good.

THE TRUTH SEEKER's offer to send eight copies of Paine's "Age of Reason" to eight different addresses for $1, to be used for missionary purposes, is still open. The best results are reported from this method of reaching intelligent believers and giving a new direction to their thoughts.

Call for the Annual Congress.

NEW YORK, OCTOBER 25TH, 26TH, AND 27TH.

To the Liberals of America, Members of the Freethought Federation and Secular Union, and all Societies organized for the Purpose of maintaining a purely Secular Government:

It is of great importance that Freethinkers should combine. It is of more importance now than at any previous period, for there is more work to do and the work cannot be done by isolated effort. There are vast ecclesiastical combinations organized for the express purpose of overthrowing Freethought, and also of uniting church and state in a more dangerous form than ever before. These questions immediately confront us:

The Taxation of Church Property,
The Bible in the Public Schools,
The Sabbath Laws, and
The Liberty of the Press.

Property to the value of a billion of dollars is exempt from taxation in the American Republic, in many places religious exercises in the public schools are on the increase, and the very foundation of universal education is being destroyed. The conflict in regard to Sabbath laws is now waged both in the states and in the national Congress, and a centralized political power is being established for the purpose of aggrandizing the authority of the church in civil matters; and honest Freethinkers are imprisoned to-day for discussing questions of the utmost importance to human improvement. Against these flagrant and ever accumulating acts of injustice we must unitedly contend. Freethinkers throughout the Union, in every state, county, city, and village, should be in active communication, and ready to meet at any point the encroachments of the church. It is often the case that a Freethinker is alone in his community in the open support of Liberal thought and principles, and for this reason suffers persecutions. Religious bigots assume that they can trample upon the Freethinker's rights with impunity on account of their own vast majority.

When it is well understood that the Freethinkers of this country are joined together and will defend one another at all hazards, the rights of Freethought will be respected and the individual Freethinker will have the power of numbers to support his cause. The theologian is naturally a coward. He persecutes only the minority. He does not trust in God unless God has a big majority. When the theologian realizes that the Freethinker is not a solitary unit, but the representative of a great force, he will not only cease his persecutions, but even welcome him to social equality. A theologian is very considerate towards a powerful party, however much he despises the humble citizen.

There is a great contest before us. We must be an organized party or submit to defeat and ostracism. We cannot fold our hands and do nothing. We must become an intellectual, social, moral, and political power through a generous and permanent comradeship. We can do this only by public meetings, congresses, associations, and a Freethought press. We must use the same instrumentalities that are constantly used by the churches. They have their great gatherings, their synods, their councils, their conventions, and in this way the churches create an immense enthusiasm and exercise a more potent sway. These are human, practical, and far-reaching means, and Freethought must avail itself of such necessary aids.

All, therefore, are urged to come together at the National Congress of the American Secular Union and the Freethought Federation of America, to be held in New York, October 25th, 26th, and 27th, 1895.

It is hoped that there will be a large attendance, and that measures of co-operation, greater advance and usefulness will be adopted and cordially carried out by all the friends of freedom throughout the country.

The members of the American Secular Union are notified that such amendments to the Constitution will be proposed at the coming Congress as will enable the Union to consolidate with the Freethought Federation of America.

The members of the Freethought Federation are also notified that changes of the same nature will be proposed for its Constitution in order that it may unite as an organized body with the American Secular Union.

It is the general desire that there be one grand national organization adapted to all the needs of the present and future work. Without doubt this will be determined in a wise, conciliatory, and progressive spirit. Let us close our ranks and meet the common enemy, the bigots of the Christian church. We work for the future; we work for humanity; we work for the best interests of civilization, for the liberty and the progress of all. Let us stand bravely by our colors and unite in the common cause. There are vast and profound principles which should harmonize superficial differences. We have no creed to support, but always and everywhere the rights of man. This is the mighty battleground. Let us rally now as never before, with earnest convictions, courage, and enthusiasm. We cannot evade the issue, neither can the church itself. It is liberty or it is slavery. This is the conflict of the ages, and in the American Republic all that is most precious and ennobling is at stake.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM, President.

There is an old gentleman about who has done much for my conversion, that is, for bringing me back into bondage to superstition. I met him the day after the libel trial, and he said he had just buried his daughter, by whose side he had watched and prayed for many days and nights; "and," said he, "I always thought of you then." "What did she die of?" I inquired, feeling sorry for the old man's trouble and bereavement. "Of cancer," he said. "Oh! dear," said I, "what a terrible thing to die of!" (I never hear of cancer without a shudder more or less). The poor old man now began energetically to urge my conversion. "What!" said I, "worship the thing that makes cancers to torture his poor helpless creatures! What! He deserves ten thousand cancers himself!" The old gentleman looked sad. He rallied a bit and again went for my soul. I repeated, "He deserves a million cancers himself;" and I was rather earnest in asserting it. The old gentleman exclaimed, "Shocking!" and went his way. Why don't they worship other noxious things? snakes, serpents, sharks, etc.? There is less madness in that than in worshipping the author of all evil. And what can Christians think to set up a God, heaven, etc., and then ascribe to him the manufacture of cancer? How can people worship the thing they feel persuaded is torturing and killing innocent friends and relatives in so inhuman a manner! What a frightful madness this is, to be sure! It beats all other superstitions, ancient or modern; and stamps the worshiper the lowest and most paltry of animals — Joseph Symes

Twenty years' imprisonment does not seem an over-severe penalty to impose on a husband who pours paraffine over his wife, sets her on fire, and then stands calmly by while she burns to what is commonly known as "a crisp." The resident of Clonmel, Ireland, who did all this was moved to take such drastic measures by his belief in witches, and more especially by his belief that the woman whom he cremated was a member of that reprehensible class. The jurors who tried him evidently held that Mr. Cleary's opinion on the witch question should be taken into account, since they convicted him of nothing more serious than manslaughter. The case establishes, therefore, that in Great Britain it is not murder to torture to death any woman whose behavior is eccentric enough to suggest demoniac possession. Once it was regarded as a pious and commendable act to put such people out of the way. Now it is manslaughter. Evidently the world moves—and ahead. —New York Times.

Lectures and Meetings.

THE Newark Liberal League will resume its meetings the first Sunday (not the Sabbath) in October. Mr. Putnam will lecture there in the evening on "Freethought in England." The League meets in Liberal League Hall, corner Market and Halsey streets.

THE Fellowship for Ethical Research meets Fridays at 8.15 p.m., at Mercantile Library Hall, Tenth below Market street, Philadelphia. September 13th, the Fellowship will discuss this question: "What Can Be Said for and Against the Roosevelt Campaign in New York City?"

FRANKLIN STEINER is now lecturing in Wisconsin. He will be in New York to attend the Congress, and then go West, lecturing in the states of Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois. About the first of January he starts for Texas, Missouri, Kansas, New Mexico, Arizona, and Colorado. Mr. Steiner has had remarkable success for the short time he has been in the field.

Letters of Friends.

And the "Pictorial Text-Book."

WEBB CITY, Mo., Aug. 30, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I see it advertised in THE TRUTH SEEKER that you will send the "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book" and also your paper one year for $3. Find the amount inclosed, and send to

S. E. CARTER.

DANVILLE, ILL., Aug. 29, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find a draft for $6. Be pleased to put my name on your subscription list and send me the "Pictorial Text-Book" and other works named. Respectfully,

D. D. EVANS.

GEORGETOWN, COL., Aug. 27, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $4.50. Please apply $1.50 to my father John Cowen's subscription, and for the remaining $3 send the "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book" and THE TRUTH SEEKER for one year to the new subscriber herein named. Wishing you success in the good cause, I remain, as ever, your true friend, MAGGIE E. COWEN.

From the Progressing South.

GUNTERVILLE, ALA., Sept. 2, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: For the inclosed $6.50 send me THE TRUTH SEEKER for one year, and "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," by S. P. Putnam.

JOHN BEISSER.

A Cheer.

KENT, O., Aug. 26, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Hurrah for Heston! Long may he live to show up to ridicule the idols and absurdities of the Christian sect. He is now on his best work, illustrating the solemn shams of its mythical tramp-god. Hoping he may have courage to continue to liberate mankind from its thralldom to priestcraft, I am, fraternally yours,

M. H. HEIGHTON.

Confirmed in a Good Habit.

BRIGHTON, IA., Aug. 29, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: As this is the eighty-first anniversary of my birth, as my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER is nearly out, and as it is my habit to pay in advance for my paper, you will find inclosed $3 to continue my subscription for another year. I have been taking the paper since soon after it was started by D. M. Bennett in Illinois.

IRA G. RHODES.

Grateful Acknowledgments.

NEWARK, N. J., Sept. 2, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: We have received your paper regularly, and thank you very much for your kindness in sending it. Kindly publish our thanks (if possible) so that other publishers may see them and follow your example. Hoping that you will continue sending us THE TRUTH SEEKER, we remain, Yours respectfully,

UNIVERSAL WORKINGMAN'S EDUCATIONAL CLUB.

The Pleasure is Mutual.

WEST SUTTON, MASS., Sept. 5, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I am as glad to be able to send, as you will be to receive, the $5 which I inclose to be applied to my subscription. I have felt ashamed every time a TRUTH SEEKER arrived since my subscription expired, but the delay was well-nigh unavoidable.

We heartily approve of the work you are doing. We commend your methods, and rejoice at the good results.

Fraternally yours, J. E. PHELPS.

Between Two Elements.

CENTERVILLE, CAL., Aug. 26, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $4.25 for the accompanying list of books. I am collecting works of this nature as fast as my circumstances will permit. I am about the only one in these parts who takes any interest in Secular doctrines, or cares to spend money to read or investigate them. There is a large class here who have no relish for investigating anything except food and drink, and the rest are mostly under the thumb of the priest, or are fettered by the creed of religious faith which they profess. I read THE TRUTH SEEKER, and also take the Freethought Magazine, being much interested in the outcome of the Kaye-Oswald controversy. I hope that the professor will be able to show the reverend brother that slinging mud is not logic, but that is always the preachers' best weapon, except lying. They have little else to stand upon against the Secularist or against Freethought. Yours, a Freethinker of thirty-five years' standing,

JOHN J. RISER.

With Settled Convictions.

SACRAMENTO, CAL., Aug. 29, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $3 for THE TRUTH SEEKER another year. I am not able to read much now, as my eyesight has gone back on me of late. I am now nearly seventy-seven, and will soon have to pass in my checks.

I have become thoroughly convinced that this life ends all, that the dead know not anything, and that all intelligence comes through a live brain. Eternal sleep is a happy thought.

R. BUTTERFIELD.

Some People Will Not Learn.

CADMUS, KY., Sept. 5, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I see my time is out the 1st of the month. I also see you want and need the money due you, which is quite natural, and I hope the brethren will whack up, for there is much need for every one to help all he can. The churches are closing in wherever they have the power. Politics and religion go hand in hand. God goes right on demolishing his houses, killing his priests, and stunning and mutilating those that have met to do him honor. And still they will not take the hint.

ASA SMITH.

A Philosophical "Earthist"

STURGIS, S. D., Aug. 27, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $3 (three Christian gods) to be applied on my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. I will not say that I can't get along without it, for I often do. It does not come regularly, but as this is the only life that I can have any pleasure in, I don't bother myself with trifles. I believe that the human race, at one time, were all lunatics, and the churches are schools for perpetuating the insanity. I believe that when we die we are like drops of rain falling into the ocean—we shall never see one another again, and we do not need to be afraid of meeting our past wives or mothers-in-law. I remain, a true earthist, THOS. HOTCHKISS.

Then Give Us Free Coinage of Silver.

HEBER CITY, UTAH, Sept. 1, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I have been a long time in responding to your call, but it is next to impossible to get hold of a dollar since the repeal of the Sherman Purchasing act and the reduction of the tariff on lead, which have closed down a good many mines, reduced the number of men and also the wages in the rest of them, and taken away our home market nearly altogether. The prices we have received in the last two years are starvation prices, and if they last much longer very few farmers out here in the West will own their homes. I think, like all the rest of the people in the West, that the nation will never prosper until the free coinage of silver is restored to the people.

I send you $1—all I can at this time—but I can't do without the old truth teller as long as it is possible for me to pay for it. If I were able I would like to help Brother Wise, but it seems that those that are the least able are the most willing.

Your friend and well-wisher,

ANDREW LINDSAY.

Dishonorable Clerical Tricks.

ST. JOHN, KAN., Sept. 1, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I am one of the delinquents that you admonish weekly to settle with the publisher, but I am sorry that I cannot pay up in full. But I will send you what I have and pay the balance as soon as I can make the turn, which will be before long. I am well pleased with THE TRUTH SEEKER, and often wish that I could spare the money to get all the Freethought literature you advertise. I am going to move, but when I am settled down again I must have your paper once more, for I cannot keep house without it.

A short time ago, one of our friends, a good old Freethinker, died, and a few days before his death the sky-pilots and other Christians crowded themselves upon him to convert him, and they prayed and talked God and Christ enough to kill a strong man, and when they got through the pilot asked him if he believed in Christ, and he said, in a murmur, he did not believe in a Christ, which were the last words uttered, and a few days later he died. He died an easy death. After his death this same gang forced a funeral sermon on his friends, and now the sky-pilots are telling the story that they converted that infidel on his death-bed, which is a damned lie. He died in just the same belief in which he lived; at least, everything pointed that way.

OLIVER FRANK.

Early Steam Navigation.

DANVILLE, ILL., Sept. 1, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Ever since Mr. Putnam introduced the subject of "the first steamer," I have been expecting some one would give John Fitch's experience, and not only give him the credit he deserves, but give the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER as correct information as can be found concerning the history of early steam navigation. My information is taken from Johnson's Cyclopaedia, and it would be profitable for our young readers if they would look up the whole article:

"John Fitch says the happy thought of propelling vessels by steam originated with him, 1784. In 1785 he commenced building his steamboat. The engine of the same was the first double-acting, condensing, transmitting power by means of cranks ever constructed. On May 1, 1787, Fitch's steamboat, the Perseverance, was put in motion on the Delaware river and made three miles an hour. After many improvements were added, the steamboat was successfully tested in 1788. It ran at the rate of one mile in seven-and-one-half minutes in dead water. With thirty passengers the vessel left Philadelphia and, moving against the current of the Delaware, reached Burlington, a distance of twenty miles, in three hours and ten minutes."

L. W. LOUTZENHEISER.

A Correction.

VINELAND, N. J., Sept. 9, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: We notice a number of errors in the Herald report of Mr. Hacker's death, which you copied. That is all a fabrication about his walking the streets and singing his poems and preaching to the crowds, and his large fortune was a myth. He was never a member of the "Ten-dollar Coffin Society," and he never requested to be buried in a cheap box and without a hearse, but desired a neat, plain, inexpensive coffin and plain hearse, without plumes or glass sides, and his wish was carried out as nearly as possible. Not an ordinary road-wagon, but a neatly-painted hearse conveyed the body to its last resting-place in the beautiful Siloam cemetery. Everything was arranged decently and in order. He was buried in a beautiful coffin, rosewood finish, lined with a shirring of some soft, white material. It was a casket nice enough for a prince, and we could but say, as we arranged his lovely silver hair that curled about his noble forehead, and brushed for the last time his long, silken, shining beard, as he lay in his coffin: "He looks like a saint or a patriarch, pure and holy, taking a well-earned rest." No expression of pain was on the calm face, and he looked not more than sixty. Not wishing a crowd, we had the funeral private, and the few dozens present were true friends, more than willing to help. Several friends spoke words of praise and tender appreciation, but the one sad feature was the want of a speaker from the ranks of the Liberals or Infidels with the eloquence of an Ingersoll to deliver at the grave a funeral oration that would do justice to the memory of the grand old hero, Jeremiah Hacker.

MRS. H. G. HEACOCK.

A Bigot of a Father.

NORTH BENTON, O., Sept. 1, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Within find $2 to apply on THE TRUTH SEEKER, the greatest light-bearer of the age. The cartoons show up the ridiculousness of the divine theory of the Bible better than language. We have a considerable amount of divine foolishness here yet, but it is passing away. A Methodist clergyman recently advertised that he would preach a sermon on the "Book of Maccabees," and I went to hear him. He announced his sermon and read two verses in Maccabees, after which he said a preacher did not know much about the Book of Maccabees, and that was the alpha and omega of his sermon. I asked him if he knew the Book of Maccabees was voted on as canonical when the Bible was voted into existence? He said he did. I asked him: If Maccabees and other rejected books had got a majority of votes, would they have been declared the word of God? and he said he supposed they would. Said I: "Does not that settle the divinity of the word of God?" but he replied that he did not want to discuss that subject.

I heard the will of a Presbyterian read a few days ago, and I mention this to show the moral rottenness of the teachings of the Christian religion. This man, Henry Hartzel, was born of Presbyterian parents; he was baptized in infancy in the Presbyterian church, he always belonged to the Presbyterian church, and a Presbyterian sermon was preached at his funeral. He accumulated a vast fortune. He had three women, and outlived them all. By his first wife he had three children, two boys and one girl; by his second wife, five children; by his third wife he had no children. He raised these eight, his daughter by his first wife staying with him till they were grown up, and, in fact, doing the part of a mother to the whole family. She was married at the age of about twenty-four years, but not to a Presbyterian, and went to housekeeping in 1861 without a penny's aid from her father. Hartzel died last month, over ninety-four years of age. He made a will in 1890, revoking all his other wills, and giving all his estate, both real and personal, to six of his children, whom he named, leaving out this daughter—who was his slave, as might be said, till she was twenty-four years old—because she refused to marry a Presbyterian instead of the man of her choice. That daughter is not in destitute circumstances, and proposes to erect a monument in memory of her dead mother, which has been neglected.

Yours truly, CHESTER BEDELL.

Belief an Absurdity.

RICHMOND, VA., Aug. 31, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: It is a remarkable fact that a large majority of intelligent people allow their minds to become warped upon the subject of religion. To doubt and investigate is thought to greatly offend an imaginary something called God. Laboring under this impression while reading the Bible, common sense is for the time laid aside, the reasoning faculties are given over entirely to blind credulity, and the consequence is that the scriptures are believed literally, word for word, from Genesis to Revelation. It must be remembered that the supposed inspired book was written by men and compiled by men, that it is filled with mistakes and contradictions, and was finally voted upon in a convention to decide which of the books were inspired and which were not. The result of this meeting was that some of them were rejected, and the probability is that those that were discarded should have been retained, and vice versa. Theologians have from time immemorial taken special delight in harping upon several passages in the New Testament, the substance of which is, unless a man believes in Christ he will be damned; that is to say, unless you believe that Christ is actually the son of God, and that he is endowed with the power of giving an immortal life of happiness to all those who profess this faith, good deeds stand for naught, and you will be cast into everlasting hell-fire. The church has always insisted that an honest disbelief in this creed is the most diabolical of sins, deserving and incurring the same future punishment as murder and robbery. Under this amazing dispensation of divine law, the world's greatest geniuses, philosophers, and benefactors, the most refined and cultured element of mankind, have been doomed to the identical fate of ruffians and out-throats. Let us calmly and dispassionately consider this, the most momentous of all questions; and in doing so, I propose to prove that such a doctrine of eternal retribution is inequitable and unjust, and that it is not in accordance with reason. As an illustration, we will say a widow, who has been married twice, goes to the cemetery and stands by the graves of her departed husbands. She is in a retrospect mood, and as she looks upon the tomb of her first husband, she remembers how kind and loving he was to her, and what a noble, upright man he had been. But he was unable to believe in the inspiration of the Bible, and he died as he had lived, making no confession or recantation whatever. She now turns to the grave of the second husband, and it flashes across her mind how dissipated and cruel he was, and what a contemptible rascal he was considered. But he was a firm believer in the Bible, a member of the church, and upon his death-bed he declared he would be saved, and that faith had washed all his sins away. Which of the two men had this woman rather meet in heaven? Yet, according to the Bible, the one that had made her life happy was suffering in torment, and the one that had made it wretched was an angel, enjoying perpetual bliss. In the name of justice and mercy, I ask, can this be true? Can there be anything more absurd than the dogma of salvation by faith, which teaches that a certain belief is necessary in order to be saved, and that an honest intellectual conviction to the contrary merits damnation. When a man commits a sin, and goes to a priest, who in consideration of a sum of money gives him absolution, this man feels and believes that he will never suffer the penalty of his sin, because he thinks he has obtained forgiveness. Always having this easy method of pardon in view, he can with impunity do the same thing the next day, pay another visit to the priest, and again feel contented. I not only contend that such a religion is not a restraint, but claim that it is the greatest demoralizer upon the face of the earth, because it offers an escape from punishment. The first step toward reforming the world and banishing superstition is to abolish the idea that a mere belief in the supernatural is a universal panacea for all our iniquities.

The gospel of Humanity must be preached, which says that we must reap the result of our acts, that for every injury done ample restitution must be made, for there is no pardoning power. This is, after all, the only true religion.

DANIEL J. PAXTON.

The Canse in Oregon.

PORTLAND, OR., Sept. 5, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: The Seventh Annual Convention of the Oregon State Secular Union will be held at Portland, Or., Friday, Saturday, and Sunday, Sept. 20, 21, and 22, 1895.

Liberals of Washington are especially and most cordially invited. All who attend will be hospitably entertained by the Women's Auxiliary of the First Secular Church. Business sessions will be held at Labor Council Hall, Stark and First streets; public meetings, Friday evening, lectures and musical entertainment; Saturday evening, dramatic performance at Turn Halle, corner Fourth and Yamhill streets; exhibition of Sunday-school work, under the direction of Miss Nettie A. Olds, at Turn Halle, Sunday morning, at 10:30. That alone will well repay a journey from any part of the United States. The Convention will close with a ball at Labor Council Hall, Sunday evening, Sept. 22d.

The opening of the Industrial Exposition has been postponed for two weeks, which will prevent friends from taking advantage of reduced rates. President Jesse is negotiating to secure reduced fare on railroad lines. In some cases this cannot be effected, on account of his not being able to guarantee the required number of passengers. Be sure to inquire for special rates when purchasing tickets for the Convention.

Neither the summer heat nor the exodus to the hop-fields has materially affected our work in Portland. The attendance continues good and the interest unabated. The greatest drawback to the work in this city is want of a suitable hall in a desirable location. When this is obtained, and efforts are being made in that direction, we shall have five to eight hundred people every Sunday night. Our Sunday-school is making glorious headway. Last Sunday we had twenty-nine members in the adult class, and fifty-four children in the catechetical and flag march.

The interest awakened can be best gaged by the fact that the leading ministers of the city, as they severally return from their vacations, make Secularism the subject of their opening sermons. Last Sunday the two most prominent ministers of the city made their sermons the vehicles of abuse of Secularism. The enemy are up in arms, terribly alarmed, and wailing for the loss of their lambs. The imbecil twaddle they get off is most pitiable, but with all their volubility and the help of the Holy Spirit (i. e., Pneuma—wind) they dare not even meet our young Hypatia, and the very mention of the old veteran's name threatens them with convulsions. Not one of them dares defend his faith in public debate. To us it is very encouraging to know how deeply our success stirs them. "She do move."

The secretary of the Sunday-school at Vancouver, Wash., has just sent in her quarterly report, announcing the average attendance of children as thirty-eight. The greatest interest is manifest. Liberals are very desirous that a lecturer should be stationed there, so they can have a lecture every week. Immediately after the Convention we hope to make arrangements to this effect.

On August 31, the Dramatic Company, an auxiliary of the church, gave their initial performance at Turn Halle, presenting the domestic drama, "Chimney Corner," and the comedy, "Irish Magnetism," with a gem selection of songs by the Sunday-school children. The performance was admitted by all to be most admirable. Both pieces were rendered without a flaw, hitch, or error. The reputation of the club is secure.

In the midst of joy we are called to mourn. The following from the Oregonian, the leading paper of this section, tells the sad story:

The funeral of Mrs. Catherine Kehm, aged sixty years, wife of Conrad Kehm and mother of Katie Kehm Smith, former pastor of the First Secular church of this city, was conducted under the auspices of the First Secular church at the undertaking parlors of Finlay & Reiger yesterday at 2 o'clock p. m. The oration, a tender and touching tribute to the memory of the dead, was delivered by Miss Nettie A. Olds, in the presence of a large circle of friends and relatives. Mrs. Kehm died as she had lived—a Secularist. The interment, at Lone Fir cemetery, was attended by a beautiful and impressive service, concluding with a song by the Secular church choir, "Lay Me Low, My Work Is Done."

Mrs. Kehm had been enjoying good health up to a few minutes before her death. Fortunately her youngest son, Herman, who had been spending a vacation in the country, arrived home just in time to receive her parting words and looks of love, and to make glad the poor old loving heart by his affectionate ministrations. She died of hemorrhage of the lungs, within twenty minutes after being attacked, leaving to the lonely sorrow of old age her faithful husband and life-long co-worker in the cause of mental freedom.

These sudden deaths, which are occurring almost every day, remind us we should ever be mindful of our duty toward our loved ones, and never neglect to gladden their hearts with words and acts of love and kindness; for how very sad must be the awakening, after some petty jealousy, pique, or passion has caused us to scorn, neglect, or fail to minister to them, to find them suddenly taken from us. Ah, if we could only realize that the happiness of life lies in the actions of to-day, and learn the lesson that Liberalism teaches, to act every day so that to-morrow will bring no regrets, we would never be called upon to shed the bitter tears of remorse. Life hangs upon a thread; then let us live so that when it is suddenly broken we shall never feel that our loved ones passed away sorrowing for the lack of that affection it was our duty to have bestowed upon them.

All intending to attend the Convention will please write me at their earliest, so that arrangements can be made for their entertainment. C. B. REYNOLDS, What's to be Done?

CHICAGO, ILL., Sept. 19, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Behind the veil of the past lie years of work, the work of those who stood and those who yet stand within the arena of combat with the monster church. Placing the results of the combat in a calm light of judgment, one must say with disheartened spirit that the combat is unsuccessful so far.

What is to be done in order to hold that monster at least so far beneath you that it do not overpower you? A straining of the faculties is unavoidable, and though every effort seems in vain, effort is still to be made and work is not to cease. But the work which is to be done must be other than that which has been done. Mere advertised lecturing and the spilling of ink will not subdue the monster. Taking Liberalism aggregatedly, to my results of reasoning, it is simply impossible to introduce ethics of a broad liberal nature if such a work is not begun with the first essential object to see that the industry of a land becomes not impaired. Industry is so lame now that many are driven to such poverty that the solicitation to have them accept the old religion becomes welcome; and hence we see them preach and lie and degrade themselves at the corners of streets, spreading the banner of plenty and collecting the beggings and charity. An army of religious beggars is growing and thereby fostering the crude religion which is so much abhorred, and with which so much injury has been done to humanity. It should be involved in the work of Liberalism that industry maintains its healthy channels, for then alone the work of Liberalism will tell. The Freethinker who gives wide scope to his investigation must understand that Liberalism means practical action, that a great movement must comprise in its component demands a furtherance of the essentials of human existence. If it merely confines itself to the untruths and curiosities of biblical dogmas, and don't become of broader function, it will be equally a curiosity, not assisting humanity, and of unintrinsic worth when confronted with the every-day ailments of the people to which it addresses itself.

The largest possible development of industrial life in the medicine for the sick, is the oil for the Freethinker. It is the bulwark that protects us from religious tyrants. The religious tyrants work upon economic principles; and whenever industry becomes impaired, it is more or less their plot to have it so, and to take advantage of the moment, drawing mankind back into religious fanaticism, thus creating an army of force and crossing the earnest efforts of Liberalism.

The object of second consideration for the Freethinker, in his work of Liberalism, is to have an all-seeing eye over the system of public schooling, that its teachers as well are purely secular and free from any taint of sectarianism. A public school is a state school, and a state school is not and cannot be a parochial school. A parochial school is the school of a society, and, if the society chooses to send its children there, it may do so, but this society has no right to force its artificial system of doctrines and usages into a state school. A state school may cease to exist if the citizens choose to withdraw their children from it, but if it ceases to exist it must cease as a pure, secular, unadulterated state school. It is a crime and a villainy for any religious, credulous society to interfere with a state school when it don't wish to send its children there, and when it has its own school and the state don't interfere to injure it.

The third important object for the Freethinker to look to, in his work of Liberalism, as a fundamental work, is, that he must build up a union of active workers, and have constitutional provisions for the mutual assistance of his fellow-member with respect to the economic well-being of his co-worker. Means must be at hand, and if the proper mode of operation is found and chosen and practiced, means, sufficiently, will come. It depends upon the caliber displayed in an organization to assure respect and success.

If the active worker happens to be a well-to-do man, he is so much better off, but if he is poor, and is dependent for a livelihood, he exposes himself to persecution and trouble should he make earnest and telling and thorough attempts at work of agitation. He therefore needs every support and an income assured to him.

Such are the cornerstones of the edifice, and no matter what ecclesiastic precedent or bad fungi may vegetate within the organization, if the cornerstone is well founded the work will flow as smooth as oil. If these fundamental objects are neglected, all attempts will fail because, being attempts founded upon sand, the showers and storm will clear them away. The organization is laughed at; it becomes rent within itself, and the more earnest you try to be the more insane you will appear when the cornerstone and foundation are not there.

Intelligence must be patronized and, in a manner, be supported. The church does this. A union must be founded upon principles by which it cannot be rent. Religion has this. Religion makes use of the babe already by a baptism to further its bad cause. It follows up the babe through its childhood and youth, and makes use of its intellect by either entirely dwarfing it, or capturing it for the seminary, where it becomes trained to assist in the crimes which the clerical bandits commit against the world.

Beware also of mingling the cause of Liberalism with numerous other isms. It is idiotic to indulge in Utopian theories, for they belong to the ideal unreal. That which I can reach is tangible, and therefore real, and I cannot afford to pass it and reach out farther for anything intangible and mere Utopian. The Freethinker must work on limited ground where he can reach about. The Freethinker must be consistent and limited in his purpose, and Freethought cannot be of universal function, but it must be consistently extensive in its demands and claims and purpose.

NEW BOOKS

BY

ROBT' G. INGERSOLL

The Field-Ingersoll Discussion. Price, 25 cents.

In 1888 the Rev. Dr. Henry M. Field wrote an open letter to Colonel Ingersoll, with the intent to convert him. The letter was published in the North American Review, and was replied to by the person addressed. All our older readers know the value of this discussion. To those who do not remember it we can only say that they should lose no time in procuring a copy if they want a controversial treat.

The Ingersoll-Gladstone Controversy about Christianity. Price, 25 cents.

When the Field-Ingersoll Controversy closed in the North American Review the Christians felt that their champion had been very badly worsted in argument, and the publishers of the Review engaged the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone to attempt to rehabilitate the Presbyterian creed. He wrote a long letter to Colonel Ingersoll, to which the latter replied at length and, it is generally agreed, completely demolished the greatest controversialist Christianity can produce. These letters are now for the first time available in pamphlet form.

Myth and Miracle. Price, 25c.

This is one of Colonel Ingersoll's best lectures, but never before put into print. Everyone who has heard it will most certainly want it, and those who have not heard it will have a rare treat in its perusal, as something new from the Colonel, which also is something that everybody is looking for.

PRIESTLY CELIBACY EXPOSED

By Rev. G. T. Fox, M.A.

Price, 15 cents, Address this office.

Children's Corner.

Edited by Miss SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

The Retort.

One day, a rich man, flushed with pride and wine—
Sitting with guests at table, all quite merry—
Conceived it would be vastly fine
To crack a joke upon his secretary.

"Young man," said he, "by what art, craft, or trade, Did your good father earn his livelihood?"
"He was a saddler, sir," the young man said,
"And in his line was always reckoned good."

"A saddler, eh? And had you stuffed with Greek Instead of teaching you like him to do!
"And pray, sir, why did not your father make A saddler, too, of you?"

At this each flatterer, as in duty bound,
The joke applauded, and the laugh went round.

At length the secretary, bowing low,
Said (craving pardon, if too free he made),
"Sir, by your leave, I fain would know Your father's trade."

"My father's trade? Why, sir, but that's too bad;
My father's trade! Why, blockhead, art thou mad?"

My father, sir, was never brought so low;
He was a gentleman, I'd have you know."

"Indeed, excuse the liberty I take;
But if your story's true,
How happened it your father did not make
A gentleman of you?" —Anon.

How I Shall Get to Heaven.

II.

When at last death, the benefactor, came,
and Joseph lay calm and still, quite free from pain and all disturbing influences, his body, robed for the last long, sweet sleer, was placed in a casket, as good as I would desire for myself, and taken into the best room in the house. At the proper time, friends, both white and dark, were invited to come in to pay their last respects, and speak the last farewell to the clay that bore the name of Joseph, once full of life, hope, and animation, now lying limp, cold, and helpless.

In accordance with his wishes, his pastor came to speak the last few words at the funeral, for I never interfered with his religious fancies, and the singers with whom he had been wont to associate came and sang the tunes he most liked to hear. It was on the 23d day of August, 1894, and through the open windows floated the strains of Jesus, lover of my soul,

Let me to thy bosom fly,
While the nearer waters roll,
While the tempest still is high.

And then, at the close of the service,
Nearer my God to thee,
Nearer to thee,

was chanted as only the Afro-Americans know how to render it.

And when this service was over, we laid his body gently and carefully away in our family burial lot in Oak Grove cemetery, where sleep my father, mother, and little Susie. In all these cares, my sister was a willing helper. Together we watched over and nursed the sick one, day and night.

I do not claim that this was more than I or she, or anyone, should have done, or ought to do, nor yet do I tell it in any boastful sense, or with any vainglory.
Nor was it done for Christ's sake, or thinking that the doing of the same would take me to heaven, for such thought never on e entered my mind. But that which I did was for poor, suffering humanity's sake only.

When I shall have told this to Peter, he will say, "Your name and former residence." I shall reply, "Susan Helen Wixon, Fall River, Massachusetts, U. S.
A." "Member of church, and if so, what denomination?" he will further inquire.
"I was never identified with any particular church—my views seemed to be broader and more liberal than any church I knew of on earth," will be my answer.

Then Peter will turn to the busy typewriter who keeps the account of deeds done in the body, and will ask this question, "What does the record say?"

Looking over the ponderous tomes till he comes to the W's, he will run his finger down the long line, where he finds my name and calls out, "Wixon, Susan H., Fall River, Mass., U. S. A.—Deeds done in the body," and he will begin to read so many things that I have forgotten—"little, nameless, unremembered acts of kindness and of love," that I shall be astonished myself to think they were recorded. "Pass to the incident that she has related, if there," says Peter, doubtfully. The man will turn a few pages, and say, "Yes, here it is, only there is more to her credit than she has told." "And you did not do this and other deeds for Jesus' sake, and hoping for reward?" and Peter will look at me in some surprise. "No, sir," I shall reply emphatically. At the same moment I shall catch the sound of a voice chanting low and sweet from a far-off aisle, but perfectly plain, these words: "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, my little ones, ye have done it unto me."

"Is there anybody here to vouch for this story as told by this lady and written in the Book of Life?" and Peter will speak up loud and distinctly. Immediately from the shining host there will emerge an angel, his face glowing with happiness and peace, and he says, "I vouch for it—I, Joseph Williams. She did it all and more."

The pearly gates will then swing wide upon their golden hinges, the music of millions of voices will burst upon my ears, and myriads of hands will be outstretched to greet me; among them I shall see the sister who died before I was born, my brothers, my father and mother, dear little Susie, and all my loved ones who went before into the unknown country.

The chieftain of the guard will say,
"Miss Wixon, you have the freedom of the city. As you roamed o'er the earth, free and fearless, as you were bound by no ecclesiastical sect, fettered by no creed, cramped by no theological chains, we can not put them upon you here. You have the same liberty here that you had on earth. Go and come at your own pleasure, and none shall harm or molest you."

With Joseph for my guide, I shall start on a tour of inspection. From the entrance we go down a sort of Midway Plai-sance, with booths and inclosures on either side. The noise is something terrific, bells jangling, folks screaming, horns blowing, and music strings twanging, all sadly out of tune. "What is all this, Joseph?" I ask. "Oh, dey is de different creeds, you know. Yonder is de Met'dist, an' nex' to dem is de 'Piscopals. Done you see ole ——, dat ye uster know, he stanin' up er readin' outer er prayer-book, jess de same as eber—see how big he feel. Ober dere is de Baptis' folks, all walled up—dey is clos' communion, jess de same, dey is.
An' dey got a puddle in dere whar dey do baptizin'." "Where are the Presbyterians, Joseph?" I ask. "Right ober dere, Miss Susan; in dere whar de blue lights shine, in dat pen, dere's de Preseterians.
Dem ministers you uster know, who was wid ye on de school committy—Rev. Mr.
——, an' ——, an' —— dey is in dere. Sometimes dey gets outen de pen, an' dey goes off by demsels, but dey come back mosely. Ober yonder is de Congationals. De Holiness folks, dey is in dat little pen yonder, and de Mormons is ober dere, and dem folks ye see on dere knees in de mud is de Salvation Army. Dem big buildings off der 'longs to de Cat'lics, an' here comes a priest wid a bag o' goles in both his han's—'tis all for de chu'ch, ye know. Dat's what dey all say. De Chinese an' de Hindoos an' all de nations, dey all here, and dere havin' a parleyment of all de 'ligions up dere—ye can go an' see 'em, if ye wants to."

We pass one big bazaar on our walk through the Plaisance, with all kinds of curious images displayed. Joseph informs me they are all the various idols and gods used on earth, and now on exhibition in heaven. It is a marvelous display and attracts many visitors. I am much amused as Joseph points out the many emblems and objects, grotesque, revolting, frightful, or otherwise, and calls them all sacred.
"Ye see, chile, dey counts from de begin-nin'." Dere's beetles an' bugs, an' snakes, an' trees, an' oxen, an' oder beasties; images of fokes, too, an' rain-gods, an' sun-gods, an' fire, an' debils, an' eberyting dat eber was washiped, an' de las' one is a big book—see."

"And where are the golden harps, the crowns, and white robes, Joseph?"

[CONCLUDED NEXT WEEK.]

Too Well Grounded in Truth to be Shaken.

Mrs. Gifford, in her zeal, has written a long letter to one of our boys of the Corner—Charley Carlton—and sent him some "Look to Jesus" tracts and cards. She means well, and is evidently sincere, and we all like sincerity and good motive.
But for Charley, boy as he is, to follow her instructions, would be like going backward a long way. Our boys and girls of the Corner are too well grounded in truth to be swayed by the breezes of superstition. They are good, sensible, bright boys and girls, and would not do anything wrong and injurious for all the world, that is, if they follow the teachings of the editor of this department. Certainly, if Mrs.
Gifford feels like praying for Charley, he will not object, but we know that all her prayers, though numbered by the million, will only go to show their uselessness.
The universe is governed, not by prayer,
but by law, and there are no miracles.
The other name of miracle is ignorance.
We are sorry for Mrs. Gifford, and wish she could be brought to see the light as it is in reason and common sense. She would then no longer be miserable and unhappy in the anticipation of an eternity of misery and unhappiness for herself or anybody else, but joy and peace would reign in her heart.

What the Little Folks Are Saying.

Lulu looked bright and rosy when she came into the dining-room, but she said, as she poured the cream on her oatmeal:

"I guess mamma was right about two pieces of chocolate cake being too much for tea. Anyway, I haven't slept very well.
Why, I believe I turned over a thousand times."

"Is it possible?" exclaimed papa, looking very serious. "Let's see! How long were you abed? Ten hours? That would be about 100 times an hour, or once every 36 seconds. A thousand times! Why, how tired you must be!"—Youth's Companion.

Correspondence.

ROCKVILLE, IDAHO, Aug. 18, 1895.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would drop you a few lines and send you a letter from Delia Gifford that I got the last time
I wrote to the Children's Corner. Also an Indian arrow-head and some rattlesnake rattles. I will send you the collection as soon as soon as I get it gathered; it will have some of nature's drawings. Yours very truly,

CHAS. C. CARLTON.

[Thanks for the pretty arrow-point and the rattles.]

Poor Mrs. Gifford! It is quite evident that her religion has nearly turned her brain, and it is pitiful. While Charley is in no need of her prayers, her sincerity is to be respected, and if it does her good to pray, it can certainly do him no harm.
He will keep straight on in the path of duty, doing all the good he can, and living the true and upright life that ever makes the respected citizen, the honorable member of the community.—Ed. C. C.]

THORNBURG, IA., Sept. 8, 1895.

SUSAN H. WIXON—Madam: I was amused at the pious, motherly advice which Delia A. Gifford gives you in THE TRUTH
SEEKER of Aug. 31st, and greatly delighted by your answer. Such expositions never come amiss, even in the Children's Corner.
They are good for the children, and good for grown people. Let us have some more occasionally.

We have your books, "Story Hour" and "Right Living." Both of them are splendid. For small children the pictures of "Story Hour" make good amusement.
For older ones the text matter is excellent.

I have taught school a number of years, and while so engaged often wished we could have such works, free from superstition, in the public school at least.

Yours truly,

E. D. NAUMAN.

[Thank you, friend Nauman, for kindly words of praise. They help us in our work, and take the chill off when others say things which hurt, as they sometimes thoughtlessly do.—Ed. C. C.]

Book Notes.

Anyone having a set of the Humboldt Library, cloth bound, and wishing to dispose of the same at a reasonable figure may find a purchaser by addressing this office.

We have received the "Handbook of Freethought." It is a small encyclopedia of fact, argument, logic, and science, presented as evidence against the false claims of orthodoxy. In this book you can put your finger on the arguments that overthrow orthodoxy. In his preface to the work Mr. Bell says: "I have aimed in preparing this work to put into compact and orderly form a large amount of irrefragable evidence against the superstitions of the church. I have often felt the need of such a work for my own use. The matter herewith presented has been culled from some of the ablest writers living and dead. As a book of reference I hope it may be a valuable aid to all investigators and truth seekers. Its running headlines, chapter heads, subheads, and classified subjects make it a 'handbook.'" Mr. Bell has certainly produced a valuable book, and we take pleasure in saying that we find it to be about the most useful work we now have in our library. Every Freethinker should have this work. It is handsomely bound and consists of 381 pages and an index, and sells for $1 in cloth and 50 cents in paper.—Truth.

Says the New York TRUTH SEEKER: "A short time ago we said this to more than thirty Liberal writers: There has been a great deal of talk at various times and by a good many of the leading Liberals about the Positive or Constructive side of Liberalism. It is stated that there is an Affirmative as well as a Negative philosophy connected with the Freethought movement; and that Liberals should build a religion or philosophy or system of morality, as well as destroy the system founded on superstition and supernaturalism." To obtain for publication the opinion of these writers on this subject the matter was put thus: "Is there an Affirmative, Positive, Constructive side to Freethought? If not, the reason why? If there be, in what, in your opinion, does it consist, and in what should it consist?" We believe with our contemporary that "this expression of opinion on this subject will be one of the most valuable and interesting contributions ever made to the literature of Freethought, and may mark the beginning of a new era in the development of the mental world." We trust every Liberal will read this symposium and circulate it among his neighbors for their enlightenment. In pamphlet form, 25 cents.—Truth

SEVERAL ministers have preached sermons against the wearing of bloomers by women bicyclists. The passage in holy writ depended upon as a crusher is found in Deuteronomy xxii, 5: "The woman shall not wear that which pertaineth unto a man, for all that do so are an abomination unto the Lord." Evidently these ministers would have the women discard shoes, stockings, and their intimate clothing.

It is reported that Mr. Keir Hardie, the Socialist ex-member of the British Parliament, now on a tour of this country, met with a very cool reception at Denver from the Populist ex-Governor Waite of Colorado. Waite is said to be opposed to the Sabbatarian and extreme moralistic and religious views of Hardie, and says that all that is good in Socialism is incorporated in the People's party platform.

400 Years OF Freethought

By Samuel Porter Putnam

Large Octavo, 1165 pp., Gilt Sides and Back, Marbled Edges. $5.

With The Truth Seeker for One Year, $6.50.

141 FULL-PAGE PORTRAITS!

Of the Most Eminent Freethinkers, of the Past Four Hundred Years.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY announced in October that this superb work was at last ready for delivery. It had been in preparation for so long that some of the subscribers were getting a little impatient and wondering when they would have the opportunity to see for themselves whether it possessed all the merits claimed for it by the publishers. They did not realize the magnitude of the work, and that the six months' delay in getting it out was due to the fact that they were to have fifty per cent more reading than they had been promised and nearly three times as many portraits. Such was the case, however. Instead of six hundred pages of letter-press there are nearly nine hundred, and the fifty portraits promised in the prospectus have multiplied to one hundred and forty-one! Considering the fact that the illustrations are the most costly part of the book—as undoubtedly to many they will also be the most attractive—and properly estimating the expense of the extra three hundred pages of text, it is evident that the subscriber received about one hundred per cent more for his $5 than was guaranteed to him. Well, the nearly eleven hundred copies of the volume subscribed for were sent out, and now we know what the recipients think of their investment. Judging by the letters that reach this office, they are not only satisfied—more than satisfied—but surprised and delighted that they got such a bargain.

As for the subject matter of FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT, it covers nearly every phase of progress and development and presents them in such orderly sequence as to give the best possible picture of human evolution. In Part First we have Freethought as a manifestation and influence; in Part Second, as an organized force. With this history are given sketches of the lives of the men and women who have taken part in the movement. It unites the past and the present. It is a world book and a home book. It fulfils the promise of its inception, and is the most magnificent work ever issued by the Freethought Press.

WITH DAUGHTER'S BABE UPON HIS KNEES.

A new edition of that splendid prose poem "Life," by the prince of orators, Col. R. G. Ingersoll. It is larger and better than the old edition, and can be framed or placed upon the table as an ornament. In the center of the card appear the portraits of the Colonel and the baby, surrounded by the prose poem, which has been truthfully described as, "one of the masterpieces of the orator and poet, who now, as far as we know, stands alone in the living world." It will make a delightful present, and will be a souvenir not only of intellectual greatness, but of artistic workmanship. It is printed on heavy board, gilt beveled edge. The size is 12x16 inches, and the price only 75 cents, post-paid.

Gems of Thought.

LIBERTY, like the sun, should know no day of rest.—New York World.

THE standard which no genius ever reached is his own severe conception.—Hawthorne.

THE person who takes things for granted is apt to find that he has no title to them.—Galveston News.

To be able to discern that what is true is true, and that what is false is false—that is the mark and character of intelligence.—Emerson.

HUXLEY was a Hiram of Tyre, who furnished timber and stone out of the primeval forests and rock.—W. H. Lyon, in Christian Register.

THE influence of Professor Huxley has been and, we fear, will continue to be very pernicious to the cause of religion.—New York Observer (Presbyterian).

WHATEVER institutions we have should be for the protection of the individual. There is nothing else to protect that ought to be protected.—E. C. Walker.

WHAT we need is an individual freedom larger even than that which we now enjoy—a larger opportunity for the best men to gain all the advantages possible for the free employment of their abilities, to the end, among other things, that they may increase opportunities for others, and especially for men of humbler powers.—Harper's Weekly.

THAT our principle [that of liberty] however baffled or delayed, will finally triumph, I do not permit myself to doubt. Men will pass away—die, die politically and naturally; but the principle will live, and live forever. Organizations rallied around that principle may, by their own dereliction, go to pieces, thereby losing all their time and labor; but the principle will remain, and will reproduce another, and another, till the final triumph will come.—Abraham Lincoln.

POSTHUMOUS fame will belong to Huxley as one of the great teachers of the last half of the nineteenth century, not because he broke from tradition, but for the reason that, following Plato, he believed that the acquisition of wealth, the possession of cleverness, and acquiescence to dogma were things which were mean "and not worthy to be called education at all."—Barnett Phillips, in Harper's Weekly. [And because he believed all this he "broke from tradition," for strict loyalty to tradition renders impossible such a life as his beliefs demanded.]

At present the most powerful and most instructed mind has neither the knowledge nor the capacity required for symbolizing in thought the totality of things. Occupied with one or other division of nature, the man of science usually does not know enough of the other divisions even rudely to conceive the extent and complexity of their phenomena; and supposing him to have adequate knowledge of each, yet he is unable to think of them as a whole. Wider and stronger intellect may hereafter help him to form a vague consciousness of them in their totality.—Herbert Spencer.

It has been claimed by the Christian critics that Voltaire was irreverent; that he examined sacred things without solemnity; that he refused to remove his shoes in the presence of the burning bush; that he smiled at the geology of Moses, the astronomical ideas of Joshua, and that the biography of Jonah filled him with laughter. They say that these stories, these sacred impossibilities, these inspired falsehoods, should be read and studied with a believing mind in humbleness of spirit; that they should be examined prayerfully, asking God at the same time to give us strength to triumph over the conclusions of our reason. These critics imagine that a falsehood can be old enough to be venerable, and that to stand covered in its presence is the act of an irreverent scoffer.—Ingersoll.

THE BRAIN AND BIBLE;

OR

THE CONFLICT BETWEEN MENTAL SCIENCE AND THEOLOGY.

By EDGAR C. BEALL, M.D.,

with a preface by

R. G. INGERSOLL.

This is the only work of its kind in the literature of Freethought. Its arguments are based upon scientific phrenology, and appeal directly to the reader's sense of logic and love of justice. It is eloquent as well as convincing.

DID MAN FALL? Is the Garden of Eden a Fact? Israel W Groh.

EPIDEMIC DELUSIONS. A Lecture by Frederic B. Marvin, M.D. Giving reasonable reasons for Religious and other Delusions.

FALSE CLAIMS OF THE CHURCH. John E. Remsburg's most noted work, and one of the most effective ever written by any Freethinker.

FIRST EPISTLE OF BENNETT THE APOSTLE TO THE TRUTH SEEKERS. Written while journeying in and near the land of Yahweh. Containing the best moral instructions of the world from the great teachers of the former ages. D M Bennett.

THE GIANT DELUSION. A paper read before the Freethought International Congress at Chicago. One of Otto Wettstein's fraternal attacks on Spiritualism.

THE GLORY OF INFIDELITY. To which is added a poem on Thomas Paine. One of Samuel P. Putnam's most brilliant lectures. Every Christian who asks the idiotic question, "What Has Infidelity Done?" should be induced to read this book, if he has to be paid to do it.

HOW CAN WE BE SAVED? Was Jesus Supernaturally Conceived, and did he Rise from the Dead? Israel W Groh.

INGERSOLL AND JESUS. Showing how the two agree. A poem by Samuel P Putnam.

THE LIMITATIONS OF TOLERANCE. A discussion between Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, Hon. Frederic B. Condit, Ex-Gov. Stewart L. Woodford, before the Nineteenth Century Club of New York. "Each man has the same right to express to the whole world his ideas that the rest of the world have to express their thoughts to him." Colonel Ingersoll maintains this, the others deny it. Mr. Condit is a Roman Catholic, Mr. Woodford a Protestant.

MATERIALISM: Its History, and Its Influence Upon Society. Dr. Louis Buchner.

MIRACLES AND MIRACLE WORKERS. A Consideration of the Marvels and Miracles of the New Testament. One of John Peck's best books.

MOSES BEFORE THE COURT, or The Forgery of the Old Testament. Dedicated to the Clergy. H. J. Seignuret, M.D.

THE NEW GOD. "It is an open secret that man has always made his Gods. They exist in and through him, as the image exists in and through the mirror. Take away man and you take away God—the image vanishes." This pamphlet, therefore, is a consideration of what kind of a God man should make. Samuel P. Putnam.

ORTHODOXY. A lecture by Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll, and one of that great man's best. "The subjects considered are: Orthodox Religion Dying Out, Religious Deaths and Births, The Religion of Reciprocity, Mohammed, The Destruction of Art, The Discovery of America, Copernicus and Kepler, Charles Darwin, Special Providence, The Latest Creed, God as a Governor, The Love of God, The Fall of Man, The Atonement, The Second Birth, Inspiration, The Reign of Truth and Love, The Wars It Brought, The Resurrection, The Judgment-Day, Pious Evasions, 'No Bible, No Civilization', Miracles of the New Testament, The Ascension, Casting out Devils, Necessity of Belief, Eternal Punishment, Some who Are Damned, What I Believe, Immortality. This lecture is on the famous text, "The Clergy know that I know that they do not know."

PERSONAL EXISTENCE AFTER DEATH IMPROBABLE. L. R. Smith.

PROCEEDINGS OF THE CIVIL RIGHTS MASS MEETING AT LINCOLN HALL, WASHINGTON. Being the Speeches of Hon. FREDERICK DOUGLASS and Col. ROBERT G. INGERSOLL on the Decision of the United States Court that the Civil Rights Act is Unconstitutional. Fifty-three large octavo pages, of which Colonel Ingersoll's speech occupies 38 pages.

PULPIT, PEW, AND CRADLE. So long as the Pulpit speaks to believing Pews composed chiefly of mothers, the cradle will be rocked by ghosts and the race will remain on its knees to a devil of its own creation and to a God who is powerless against him. One of Hel n Gardener's bright efforts.

THE RELIGION OF HUMANITY BETTER THAN ETERNAL PUNISHMENT. M. Babcock.

RELIGIOUS PROBLEMS. One of L. K. Washburn's best lectures, and it is, like all of his, very good.

THE ROARING LION ON THE TRACK. One of M. Babcock's comical sermons.

SCIENCE vs. RELIGION, or The Conflict Between Reason and Superstition. T O Widdcombe.

ST. MATTHEW BEFORE THE COURT. Presenting the evidence of the forgery of his alleged gospel. H J Seignuret.

SPIRITUALISM FROM A MATERIALISTIC STANDPOINT. B F Underwood. Written before Mr. Underwood joined the Psychic Researchers.

THUMBSCREW AND RACK. Torture Implements Employed in the 15th and 16th centuries for the promulgation of Christianity. Being the Nuremberg Collection, with specimens from the Holy Inquisition. 28 pictures. The descriptions and reflections by George E. Macdonald.

VICTOR HUGO'S ORATION ON VOLTAIRE, delivered on the one hundredth anniversary of Voltaire's death. Translated by James Parton, author of the Life of Voltaire. To which are added the three great poems of Goethe, George Eliot and Longfellow.

WAS CHRIST CRUCIFIED? Austin Bierbower. A lawyer's consideration of the evidence of that alleged event.

WAS JESUS INSANE? A consideration of Christ's alleged acts which would lead one to that conclusion. L K Washburn.

WHY DON'T HE LEND A HAND? And other Agnostic Poems. Samuel P. Putnam. The title poem is perhaps the most popular of Mr. Putnam's many poems, and a great many editions of it have been called for. The other poems are: The Golden Age, The Ideal and the Real, Not Dead, but Living, Fruition, Hope, Thomas Paine, Nature's Gospel, Address to Deity, and the short poem so often recited with great effect by Charles Watts, Give Us Light.

WILL THE COMING MAN WORSHIP GOD? B F Underwood; written before Mr. Underwood joined the Psychic Researchers.

BOBBY was very much impressed by the remark of the minister at church that man was made of dust. "Ma, he said," after a thoughtful silence, "was I made of dust, too?" "Yes," she replied. "Well, how is it, then, that my birthday comes in January? There isn't any dust in January."

MOTHER: "There, Willie, is ten cents for you. Now, what are you going to buy with it?" Willie: "Save it up to buy fireworks for the Fourth of July." Mother: "But you know you are saving money to give to the heathen." Willie: "Yes'm, but the Chinese are heathen, aren't they?" Mother: "Yes, dear." Willie: "Well, they make the firecrackers, so the heathen'll get my money just the same."

ABRAHAM AND EPHRAIM.

He sermonized industriously in his didactic way,
And moralized momentarily with Ephraim every day,
And taught by tale and proverb and by every good device
The virtuousness of virtue and the viciousness of vice.

His hortatory homilies intended to impress
The rightfulness of righteousness, the sin of sinfulness,
Were ever hurled at Ephraim throughout the whole year long,
That he might rightly comprehend the wrongfulness of wrong.

"A youth can grow up virtuous, if we but pay the price;
If we but saturate his soul with showers of advice;
If we instill," said Abraham, "perpetual truth in him—"
And so in truth perpetually he soaked young Ephraim.

The youth absorbed a sermon every morning ere he ate
On the awful reprobation of the awful reprobate;
And he swallowed moral theses that were meant to edify,
And he masticated maxims with his gingerbread and pie.

And 'twixt breakfast time and dinner the iniquity of sin
Was taught to him industriously and patiently rubbed in,
The turpitude of turpitude was duly analyzed,
And the evil of depravity was loudly advertised.

And then right after dinner the enormity of crime
And the wrong of immorality was preached till supper time,
Then Abraham would sermonize through all the evening hours,
And drench young Ephraim's consciousness in moralistic showers.

Thus through cumulative precept did old Abraham desire Accumulative virtue should young Ephraim acquire;
He taught him virtue endlessly and waited long to see How superlatively virtuous young Ephraim would be.

Thus maxim-goaded Ephraim found righteousness a bore,
For salve is but an irritant when jammed into a sore;
Even bread is innutritious if you resolutely cram
An indiscriminate bakery down the bursting diaphragm.

Thus by hortatory homilies did Abraham impress
The wrongfulness of righteousness, the good of sinfulness;
And taught by tale and proverb and by every good device,
The viciousness of virtue and the virtuousness of vice.

Hence, Ephraim lived a reckless life and died a felon's death,
But gave this vindication with his latest dying breath:
"I have been sermonized to death; I die, to speak precise,
An unprotected victim of perpetual advice."

Artist Heston as a portrait painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—[Freethinkers' Magazine.]

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of his volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. THERE was a killing frost last week over New England and in the Middle states and lake region.

AN earthquake at Tegucigalpa, Mexico, on the 12th caused the death of 300 persons and a property loss of $750,000.

THERE are said to be 30,000 prostitutes in New York city. On an average they live nine years after becoming such.

CITIZENS of New York who favor a "more liberal Sunday law" will hold a monster parade on September 25th.

THE gold reserve in the United States treasury is reduced by shipments abroad, and another issue of bonds is discussed.

STEERAGE rates on the Cunard line of steamers have been raised to $26 and reduced rates by rail to embarking points abolished.

DURING a thunder shower at Allegheny, Pa., on the 10th three churches were struck by lightning. All the churches were Presbyterian.

TWO hundred Chinese, who landed at Vancouver, B. C., en route for the Atlanta Exposition, will not be permitted to enter the United States.

TWENTY persons have been arrested at Bucharest, Bulgaria, upon the charge of complicity in a conspiracy against the life of Prince Ferdinand.

NONE of the miners entombed in the burning Osceola mine, near Houghton, Mich., on the 7th, were rescued. Nearly thirty bodies have been recovered.

HENRY M. STANLEY, the African Explorer from London, is in New York. He will go West as far as San Francisco, and on his return will report whether the country is satisfactory.

SOUTH CAROLINA has a constitutional convention now in session. The problem before it is how to provide for universal male suffrage and at the same time curtail the Negro vote.

SPAIN has paid the Mora claim of $1,449,000. Mora is an American citizen whose estates in Cuba, worth $5,000,000, were confiscated by the Spanish government twenty-five years ago.

AT the Grand Army national encampment at Louisville, Ky., September 12th, Gen. Ivan N. Walker, of Indiana, was elected commander-in-chief. During the war General Walker was in command of the Third Indiana Volunteers.

THE Melbourne Harbinger of Light says that Mrs. Mabel Besant Scott, only daughter of Mrs. Annie Besant, was baptized into the Roman Catholic church on May 1st.

CHOLERA has secured a strong hold in Honolulu, where the difficulty of treating it is enhanced by the lack of native confidence in the health authorities. The disease has also appeared in Tangier, Morocco.

AN accident, Sept. 11th, on the Great Northern railroad between Ashton and Evansville, Minn., caused the death of seven persons. Thirteen were seriously injured. All the dead were residents of St. Paul.

THE New York Central railroad runs a train from this city to Albany and back at the rate of 64½ miles an hour. England has heretofore held the record for swift railroading, but this is the fastest train in the world.

MRS. MARY E. LEASE, the Kansas Populist, is reported to have espoused the "nationalization of the liquor traffic"—all breweries and distilleries to be under government control, and government agents to supervise the sales.

To quell a riotous strike of miners, the mayor of Ishpeming, Mich., swore in a crowd of the strikers as special police. The new officers arrested all non-union men who appeared, and in that way order was partially restored.

A MEDDLING parson in Paterson, N. J., named Wood, who, in collusion with his deacon and another member of his church, laid plans for securing evidence against a saloon keeper for the purpose of getting his license revoked, has been arrested on a charge of conspiracy.

THE troops at Fort Logan, Col., one day recently, tested a new "emergency ration" prescribed by the war department, and in a few hours the medical officer had fifty men on his hands suffering from gripping pains in the stomach, and had to go to Denver for assistance.

THE editors of the German papers Vorwaerts and Volksblatt are under arrest for speaking in uncomplimentary terms of the recent celebration of the German victory over France in 1870. Emperor William expresses his determination to suppress Socialism in his domain.

MORE than 24,000 Spanish troops have been landed in Cuba this month. There is talk that the United States may soon recognize the belligerent rights of the Cubans. Meanwhile preparations for the prosecution of filibusters are going on, and Spain is purchasing ships in New York.

THE New York police did not fulfil their promise to suppress the sale of liquors in the rich men's clubs of the city last Sunday. There was no suffering in any of these institutions, and the Union League Club, of which Police Commissioner Roosevelt is a member, was wet, as usual. Twenty-seven saloon keepers were arrested.

CHARLES C. MOORE, editor of the Blue Grass Blade, Lexington, Ky., has been arrested on a charge of sending obscene literature through the mails. The matter complained of is his advertisement of Mrs. Besant's work, "Law of Population." Moore is a careless writer, and got up the advertisement in the same manner in which everything else from his pen is written. It is rather flippant, in view of the delicacy of the matter discussed, but, except that it does injustice to the book itself, it is as harmless as Mother Goose's melodies. The arrest is probably instigated by the clergyman who had Moore prosecuted last year for blasphemy and failed to secure a conviction. At last accounts Editor Moore was in jail in default of $1,000 bail, which, though doubtless able, he refused to give, declaring that he would spend his life in jail before he would fight the case in court. It is likely to prove a very serious matter for the accused.

the American yacht Defender and the English yacht Valkyrie, did not end satisfactorily, though the superiority of the American boat was demonstrated. Before the start of the second race the Valkyrie fouled the Defender, carrying away the latter's topmast stay and seriously crippling her. The Valkyrie won this race by 47 seconds, but it was awarded to the Defender, which had lost two minutes at the start, on account of the foul. In the third race the Valkyrie crossed the starting line and then quit, Lord Dunraven, the nominal commander, alleging that the course was not clear of excursion boats. His action is severely criticised on this side of the Atlantic, and is commended on the other, though nobody thinks that he could have won the race if he had sailed. The owners of the Defender have proposed to resail any or all the races, and prizes worth from $2,000 to $10,000 have been offered the Valkyrie to enter a new contest either here or elsewhere on the Atlantic coast, but Lord Dunraven declines everything. The cup is awarded to the Defender.

THE FOLLY OF THE FAITHFUL.

Special NEW SUBSCRIBER Offer.

We wish, for two good and valid reasons, to greatly extend the circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER. First, we want its influence for good and its efforts for greater liberty of thought to be more widely distributed, and consequently more effective. Second, we want more subscribers to help pay its expenses and enable us to do more work. And we wish to emphasize both of these reasons. Our present subscribers can do a great deal for us if they will, and to get them to aid us we are willing to reward them; we therefore make this SPECIAL NEW SUBSCRIBER OFFER:

To any subscriber now on our list who will get a new name for the list for one year, sending us three dollars for the same, we will send free a copy of the FREETHINKER'S PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK, in board covers (price TWO DOLLARS).

And to anyone whose name is not now on our list we make this offer: Send us three dollars for the paper one year, and we will send you free the PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK.

The pictures in the FREETHINKER'S PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK were made and the text written to show the absurdity and untruthfulness of the Church's claim to being a divine and infallible institution, and to reveal the abuses of a union of church and state. It has 185 Full-page Illustrations, with copious citations of Facts, History, Statistics, and Opinions of Scholars to maintain the argument of the Artist. The Designs are by WATSON HESTON and include a portrait of the designer. The pictures are classified as follows: Of those representing Uncle Sam and the Priests there are 16; representing The Church Robbing the People, 2; Thanksgiving, 3; Sabbath Laws, 6; Children and the Church, 11; Woman and the Church, 10; The Church and Thomas Paine, 6; Studies in Natural History, 4; The Bible and Science, 2; The Clergy and Their Flocks, 15; Piety in Our Penitentiaries, 1; The Atonement Scheme, 4; The Lord and His Works, 4; Prayer, 2; The Creeds, 10; Christians and Mohammedans, 1; Samples of Christianity's Work, 2; Missionaries, 5; The Lord's Instruments, 1; Bible Doctrines and Their Results, 25; Church and Slavery, 1; Priests and Politics, 2; Ireland and the Church, 4; Church Ideas of Civilization, 2; Uses of the Cross, 1; Unkind Reflections on the Church, 4; Persecutions by the Church, 9; Some Allegories, 12; Heaven, 3; Hell, 6; Miscellaneous, 7.

This offer cannot apply to renewals. Premiums for them can be found on the second page of this issue. We are giving five dollars' worth for three in this offer, and there is no profit in it except that we shall get many renewals of these subscriptions; the subscribers will also, probably, buy a few books from time to time, and the small margin on them may make us whole. Induce your neighbor to subscribe, and so get the book for yourself. Or, if you are not now a subscriber, send us three dollars and get both paper and book—FIVE DOLLARS' WORTH FOR THREE DOLLARS.

Read what the papers and people have said of the book and see if it is not worth while to make a strong effort to obtain it. The book has had a large run; five thousand copies have been sold, and everyone who paid two dollars for it says it is worth a good deal more. Now we are giving it away, and you can get a copy if you will. Do not delay, but get it now.

When Renewing Your Subscription, Take Advantage of These Good Offers.

For $6.50 we will send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year ($3) and S. P. Putnam's "Four Hundred Years of Freethought" ($5). Large Octavo, 1150 pages, gilt sides and back, marbled edges—the most magnificent work ever issued by the Freethought Press. 140 Half Tone Engravings of the Prominent Freethinkers of the past four centuries.

The object of this work is to present the Course of Freethought throughout the Civilized World from the time of Columbus and Bruno to the time of Ingersoll. It is a radical Historic Record of the greatest developments of the human race. It reveals Freethought as an intellectual, moral, literary, social, industrial, and political movement. It shows what Freethought is in itself, how manifold are its influences, and with what promise we can hail its future triumph. "FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT" embraces the most illustrious pages of human history, adorned with the brightest genius, radiant with the most splendid poetry, rich with the greatest inventions and discoveries, and ennobled with freedom's most shining advance. Nothing can be more interesting or more inspiring to the pioneer workers of to-day, to those who are still in the van for human rights and progress. No Liberal can afford to be without this book. It contains the greatest thoughts and the greatest deeds of the greatest men in one harmonious and magnificent whole, a vivid picture of man's sublimest evolution, with the added glory of woman's emancipation from the chains and slavery of a barbaric church.

By GEORGE J. ROMANES.

A systematic Exposition of what may be termed the Darwinism of Darwin, and intended to be of service to the general reader rather than to professional naturalists.

Mr. Romanes is well known as one of the most interesting of English writers upon evolution, besides ranking with Professor Huxley in scientific knowledge and ability. And this is a part of his conclusion regarding the great subject of Design, to which the church so often refers: "Thus whether we look to the facts of adaptation or to those of beauty, everywhere throughout organic nature we meet with abundant evidence of natural causation, while nowhere do we meet with any independent evidence of supernatural design. . . . Adaptation and beauty are alike receiving their explanation at the hands of a purely mechanical philosophy. . . . All nature has thus been transformed before the view of the present generation in a manner and to an extent that has never before been possible; and inasmuch as the change which has taken place has taken place in the direction of naturalism, and this to the extent of rendering the mechanical interpretation of nature universal, it is no wonder if the religious mind has suddenly awakened to a new and a terrible force in the words of its traditional enemy—Where is now thy God?"

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with a little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroine. The narrative is, in the main, a history of a working-girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business-men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrites. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world.

"The Truth Seeker" Prohibited in Canada, but Still Circulating.

That THE TRUTH SEEKER is cutting deep and getting at the vitals of the Christian superstition is more and more evident every day, as the efforts of the church bigots to suppress it attest. The frantic cry of the National Reformers, as the God-in-the-Constitution party style themselves, was noticed in these columns last week, and this week we must expose another attempt to suppress our paper. Invidiously this last assault furnishes the best possible answer to those Christian who want to give our postmasters and post-office officials the power to decide what shall be circulated through the mails, and shows that, could Comstock get his law amended as he wants to, no paper in the country would be safe if it opposed the administration in power. In this decision against THE TRUTH SEEKER by the postmaster-general of Canada we have another convincing illustration of the injustice irresponsible power can inflict. We want the Canadian press to particularly ponder on the wording of their law, which renders "scurrility" a sufficient excuse for suppression, leaving it to the postmaster-general to decide what scurrility is, and making his decision final, unappealable, and irremediable. Under this decision, it will be very easy to suppress the political press, as there never was a political campaign conducted in which both parties did not use what the party in power can call scurrility in discussing the other fellows' candidacy.

The opposition to THE TRUTH SEEKER is of course on account of its alleged blasphemy. Even the malignity of a Roman Catholic postmaster-general cannot make it scurrilous, which is, as Webster gives it, "using the low and indecent language of the low and indecent people, or such as only the license of buffoons can warrant." At no time did this paper ever "contain low indecency or abuse," nor was it ever "mean," "foul," "vile," or "obscenely jocular." No stretch of language can make it come under any of these definitions, though no political journal could escape one of them, so we know that it is its "blasphemy" which makes it obnoxious to the post-office people of Canada.

The postmaster-general of Canada is Adolph Caron, a Roman Catholic bigot. We have a subscriber in Guelph, Ont., named Robert Mitchell, who missed getting his paper, and as we sent it regularly, we asked him to make inquiry of his postmaster as to its non-delivery. With this explanation the following correspondence is very interesting:

"IN HASTE.

"GUELPH, ONT., Aug. 26, 1895.

"Dear Sir: I wrote our post-office inspector and received the inclosed. Our Postmaster-General Caron is a French Canadian papist of the densest ignorance and full of superstition. He gets his instructions through what is called Cardinal Taschereau by the dupes, but of course a British dominion like Canada shouldn't have a popish postmaster-general. Had we had a Protestant postmaster-general, even, such a thing would not have happened. You should make a terrible racket at Washington and have all Canadian papal publications stopped from demoralizing the United States of America. I have not yet received the back numbers, but hope to; will be glad to hear from you shortly.

"Sincerely your friend, ROBT. MITCHELL."

The letter of the post-office inspector referred to by Mr. Mitchell is the following:

"STRATFORD, Aug. 24, 1895.

"Dear Sir: I am in receipt of yours of the 23d inst. re non-receipt of TRUTH SEEKER. In reply I beg to inform you that this paper is prohibited transmission by mail in Canada. H. G. HOPKINS, P.-O. Inspector.

"D. M."

Upon receipt of this we wrote to Mr. Caron, saying:

"NEW YORK, Aug. 27, 1895.

"POSTMASTER-GENERAL CARON, Ottawa, Ont., Dear Sir: One of our subscribers residing in Guelph, Ont., has forwarded us a letter to him by a post-office inspector at Stratford, as follows: [letter as above.]

"Will you be kind enough to tell us why this prohibition? We know of no Canadian law which we violate, and neither can our subscriber find any. Will you kindly point out the law which enables the postmaster of a friendly country to condemn and confiscate, without trial, the publications sent from another country on which the regular postage has been paid?

"Yours very truly, E. M. MACDONALD."

To this inquiry the postmaster-general's secretary replied:

"OTTAWA, Sept. 6, 1895.

"E. M. MACDONALD, Esq., Sir: I am directed to acknowledge your communication of the 27th ultimo, making inquiry in regard to the exclusion of your paper, THE TRUTH SEEKER, from the Canadian mails, and, in reply, to say that the postmaster-general may legally, under authority conferred upon him by the Post-office act, prohibit the transmission by mail in Canada of any publication which he considers as being of a scurrilous or blasphemous character.

"I am, sir, your obedient servant,

"W. D. LE SUEUR, Secretary."

This reply not fully meeting our requirements, we wrote again:

"NEW YORK, Sept. 10, 1895.

"A. P. CARON, Esq., Postmaster-General, Ottawa, Can., Dear Sir: I am in receipt of your favor of the 6th in reply to mine of the 27th ult., in regard to the official exclusion of THE TRUTH SEEKER from the Canadian mails, and I again beg leave to trouble you for information. Your secretary says that you may under the Post-office act exclude scurrilous or blasphemous matter. Will you kindly inform me if the act defines such matter or whether it is left to the judgment solely of the postmaster-general? Also, will you inform me as to which issues of THE TRUTH SEEKER, or what matter contained in any issues, is decided by yourself to come under either definition? Will you also inform me whether there is any appeal from your decision, and to what tribunal such appeal should be made? I am yours truly,

"E. M. MACDONALD."

To this the secretary made a longer response, as follows:

"OTTAWA, Sept. 14, 1895.

"E. M. MACDONALD, Esq., Sir: I am directed to acknowledge your letter of the 10th instant, in which you make certain inquiries as to the provisions of the law under which the postmaster-general has lately decided to exclude THE TRUTH SEEKER from the Canadian mails, and I am instructed to reply to your inquiries as follows:

"1. The Post-office act does not define the sense in which the words 'scurrilous' and 'blasphemous' are employed therein. The interpretation of these terms, for the purposes of the act, is left to the postmaster-general.

"2. The postmaster-general cannot quote the date of the issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER to which his attention was called, nor specify the particular article, or articles, which, at the time, seemed to him more especially open to the charge of scurrility or blasphemy. He had no hesitation, however, in deciding—and his opinion was supported by that of the minister of justice—that, on account of the character of its contents, the paper was one which, under the law, ought to be excluded from the mails of this country.

"3. As the Post-office act empowers the postmaster-general to decide on the character of any publication claiming admission to the mails, there is no appeal from his decision. I am, sir,

"Your obedient servant, W. D. LE SUEUR."

And to make the thing complete and leave no doubt of the intention of the post-office, we get this official card from the postmaster at Guelph:

"POST-OFFICE, GUELPH, Sept. 14, 1895.

"SIR: The last number of your publication addressed to Robt. Mitchell, Box 133, Guelph, has not been taken out of my office by the party addressed, for the following reasons: Transmission in Canada prohibited. Kindly stop, as it is sent to Deal Letter office every week.

"Your obedient servant, D. HESTON."

So here we have as complete a suppression of THE TRUTH SEEKER in Canada as the venomous power of the post-office will permit. Two other postmasters besides this one at Guelph have been bothering themselves in the matter and giving our subscribers and ourselves trouble. But THE TRUTH SEEKER still reaches its friends in Canada and will continue to reach them until there is some other turn of the machine.

Religiously, Canada is a very bigoted country. Ontario is run by the Protestant church, and Quebec by the Catholic hierarchy. Of course to both of these branches of Christianity heresy is a crime—indeed, the crime of crimes, the positively unforgivable sin. But as they cannot get at a man's mind to punish him for thinking, they have made the expression of his belief blasphemy, and punish him for that. And to still further protect their pet system of superstition they deny men the right to have papers and books attacking it. For years we have had trouble occasionally in getting books to those who live in Canada. The following letter, which we received last month, is now of considerable interest, as, taken in connection with the prohibition of THE TRUTH SEEKER, it indicates a well settled determination on the part of both Protestant and Catholic churches to suppress the publications of this office. We certainly feel highly gratified at this tribute to our influence and effective work against the Christian church:

"NANAIMO, B. C., Aug. 19, 1895.

"THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY, Gentlemen: The book, 'Old Testament Stories Comically Illustrated,' for which I wrote some time ago, found its way to the custom house on the 15th inst. In the evening I received a postal card to the effect that the book had been 'seized by customs.' I called at the custom house next day and saw the inspector, or 'boss' man, who told me he could not let me have the book, for all such literature had been condemned by the chief of the customs as 'immoral,' and therefore could not be allowed to pass through the post. The customs officer here said he had nothing to do with the matter himself; he was only acting on instructions from headquarters. He showed me the instrument of authority and read it, and the aforementioned book was one of those condemned. This sort of thing is a bit tough on men who prefer to use the brain power with which the Lord has endowed them, instead of being led by the petticoat representatives of the frill-work of Christianity. I was much disappointed in not getting the book. It was not for myself but for another.

"On Friday I was speaking to a man here named Hardy. He sells a good many Freethought books, and he told me that the book in question had, for a long time past, been a considerable eyesore to the clergy of this city, and they have done all in their power to prevent the sale of it. In fact, the Presbyterian minister, McRaie, has stopped Hardy on the street on more than one occasion and tackled him on the subject. Hardy holds that, the book not being immoral, he will sell it so long as he can get customers to buy it.

"In the course of the short conversation I had with the customs officer he told me that for some time past he had been worried by these people to prevent this book being passed out of customs, as they maintain it is both obscene and immoral, so to satisfy their clamor he was compelled to write to headquarters for instructions.

"This city is one of the lowest on the Pacific slope, being little better than a cesspool of vice, corruption, and immorality; and the only really respectable portion of the community are those who belong to no church or creed whatsoever.

"What do the clergy do here to stay the downward course of this otherwise fair city? Nothing whatever. But they have time to stop the sale of a comic picture-book. These lean-souled vicars of Christ have no influence whatever over the people of this city outside of their own little flock of geese, and very little over them. The tearing up of my book in the customs office, before my face, I hold to be a mean and contemptible trick, the outcome of prejudice, bigotry, and hypocrisy. THE TRUTH SEEKER is read quite extensively in this city, and a short article would give the Freethought cause a good lift up and the blooming hypocrites a good dressing down. I haven't time to write a stiff letter to our Free Press, and if I had the Free Press would not publish it, because the Free Press is not free. I was speaking to a friend here who is one of us about the tearing up of my book, and he said he believed it was an illegal act of the customs, and that you might find it to your interest to deal with the authorities on the subject or take action against them. This petty tyranny may cause inconvenience and loss to many of us. Yours truly,

"J. H. HOBBS."

We know of no legal remedy in this matter, except a suit by the aggrieved citizens of Canada. Some time ago the customs officials seized the "Age of Reason." Capt. R. C. Adams then imported copies from this office, and notified the customs people of his action and invited them to seize the books in order that a test case might be made. After considerable correspondence, and much seesawing, the customs officials backed down and delivered the books. But for years this thing has been going on in a desultory way, and the seized books have included Ingersoll and other writers. Matter sent from one country to another is subject to the laws and official rulings of the country to which it is sent, and the senders from the other country seem powerless. These decisions against the "Old Testament Stories" and THE TRUTH SEEKER, coming so close together, indicate that the determination to suppress Infidel literature has taken an organized and comprehensive form, with the animus mainly directed against THE TRUTH SEEKER because of its more aggressive and persistent and wide-spread work. It is needless to say that we shall fight this attempted suppression in every way, and instead of keeping our paper and books out of Canada shall try to get more in.

The action of Mr. Caron in ordering THE TRUTH SEEKER from the mails of the country is one of the most high-handed outrages against the rights of the people of Canada that can be conceived. Even though the Freethinkers are comparatively few in number they have the same inherent right to get the paper of their choice that the most bigoted Methodist or the most besotted Roman Catholic has. And the power lodged with him by the ignorant legislature will yet be used in a way to make the people regret the act. Any journal can be suppressed at his will, there is no appeal from his dictum, and no responsibility attaches to his acts. He does not even know what articles in THE TRUTH SEEKER, or what issue of the paper, he objects to. All he says is, that he does not like the paper and thinks it should be suppressed, and suppresses it so far as his power extends. He may take it into his bigoted head to suppress a Protestant paper or an opposition political paper, and there is no remedy. The Canadian editors and publishers are completely at his mercy, which mercy is the mercy of the Roman Catholic church, and we all know what that mercy is. Give her the power and she will hang, and burn, and imprison, and torture now as she did of old. Under the law, Caron is the autocrat, the full-armed censor of the press, the despot who can ruin any paper in Canada.

How do the Canadian press like the prospect? How do the Protestant papers like being under the thumb and at the mercy of a bigoted Roman Catholic? How would the Roman Catholic papers like being under the thumb and at the mercy of such a man as the Presbyterian minister McRaie, who bulldozed the customs officer of Nanaimo into tearing up the "Old Testament Stories"? The notorious censorship of Russia is duplicated on this side of the Atlantic, and if it can be applied to religion it may soon reach politics. The Roman Catholic church is in the saddle in Canada, and every one acquainted with the history of that infamous institution knows that it will stop at nothing to gain its ends and increase and perpetuate its power. The denial of mail privileges to THE TRUTH SEEKER is but a step backward to medievalism. A few months ago the church suppressed a French paper which criticised and exposed the church officials, and they have so far terrorized the press of Montreal that the journals dare not advertise a lecture by Colonel Ingersoll for which his manager had arranged, and the engagement had to be canceled. If the people of Canada do not arouse they will find themselves in a pretty bad plight. Bad as it is now, who, with a bit of knowledge, does not know that it will soon be much worse?

The Effect of the New York Republicans' Sunday Plank.

The action of the Republican party in this state in adopting as one of the planks of its platform the resolution introduced by that notorious pietist, Warner Miller—to wit: That the party is in favor of the maintenance of the "Sabbath" in the interests of labor and morality—has had the effect of materially widening the scope of the struggle now going on in this state. Police Commissioner Roosevelt began the Sunday closing of the saloons to stop the blackmailing of the saloon-keepers by Archbishop Corrigan's political organization known as Tammany Hall. But "Teddy" has been patted on the back so much by the ministers that he is beginning to think that he is a messiah to lead the world to Sunday righteousness, and in his later speeches talks as if the closing of all business on Sunday were the proper thing. The issue has therefore broadened and is now in a shape to suit Liberals much better than when it was a question simply of whether or not a man should be able to get liquor on Sunday.

The Democratic party will meet the Republican plank by declaring in favor of local option. Our present Sunday law bears the signature of Governor Hill, Tammany Democrat. In enacting it Tammany Hall allied itself with the Puritans of the state. The Puritans wanted the law in order to persecute "Sabbath" breakers. Tammany wanted it to use as a club to blackmail saloon-keepers. At that time the Catholic church did not seem to attach so much importance to Sunday observance as it has come to do since allying itself with the God-in-the-Constitution party, and it did not care if the saloon-keepers broke the law every Sunday so long as Tammany retained control of the city, and so kept the church in funds. At the present time, for good and sufficient financial and other reasons, the Catholic church is on the side of the Puritan Sabbatarians.

If local option is had, therefore, it is doubtful if this city will be carried for it against the wishes of this church, whose authorities will have to be pretty well satisfied where they are coming in before they reverse the policy they are now committed to. Local option, the present cry of the Democrats, will be found to be inadequate to solve the problem, even should they carry the state, and they will naturally be forced to take broader ground. It is inconceivable that New York will continue forever to be run like a country town, and the real issue of Sunday law or no Sunday law, not only for saloons but for all businesses and interests, will come up inevitably. It cannot be kept down; the political parties will be forced to take sides, which will probably split them, for there are Liberal men in both parties and both parties cater to the church—"work the religious racket," as they call it.

What the Liberals want is a general fight on the Sunday question, on principle, and not on the excise question. Every man should determine for himself what he will do on Sunday, as he does on other days. And if the two great parties shall get to fighting on this point, Liberty will be the gainer—for the laws can hardly be worse than they now are.

Dare Not Avow the Intent to Persecute.

With the legal-fetich worshiper it is sufficient that wrong is done in the name of law. He can see no injustice in fining and imprisoning men and women for violation of Sabbath laws. He holds that they are the aggressors because they have disregarded "Law," with a big L. Therefore, they are not persecuted. They are simply punished for their disturbance of the peace of the state. He cannot distinguish between just and unjust law—unless he happens to be one of the victims. And all this notwithstanding that the heroes whom he honors, the martyrs whom he reverences, even the very man-god whom he worships, were the law-breakers of their time and suffered as such in the dungeon and upon the rack, at the stake and on the scaffold and the cross. He seems unable to see that statutes enacted to limit the non-invasive liberty of the citizen are simply edicts of persecution, that in the nature of things they cannot be anything else, that it is impossible for them to possess the dignity and sacredness of defensive laws which all protected by them are under solemn obligation to obey. In this connection the American Sentinel of September 12th has these very pertinent observations:

"It is denied by some that the Adventists are persecuted. But persecution has never been called by that name by those who engaged in it—it has always been 'ONLY ENFORCING THE LAW.' Nor has there been, as a general thing, any attempt to justify persecution avowedly in the interest of religion. In every age and in every country religious intolerance has been defended, to a greater or less extent, on the ground of public policy. Dissenters have ever been accused as enemies of the state, subverters of social order, disturbers of the public peace, and violators of the civil law, just as Seventh-Day Adventists are to day stigmatized as Anarchists and indicted for acts 'against the peace and dignity of the state.'"

These are truths that it would be supposed all could understand, and that would naturally occur to the minds of thoughtful persons. But they do not make any impression in certain quarters—in fact, not only do men not arrive at the truth in this matter by their own excogitations, but they are unable to see it when presented to them by others. Slaves of the grossest superstitions, the editors of many of the papers of this city, including some of the most serious and conscientious, earnestly contend that the law should always be enforced and obeyed "because it is law," regardless of its constitutionality or justice. They applaud wholesale robbery and other forms of persecution, and condemn as enemies of society and promoters of crime those who see more clearly than themselves. When they know that the Sunday law, for instance, was enacted in the interest of a class and that that class is using the law for the purpose of tormenting those who differ from its members in opinion and habits of life, precisely as it was intended to be used, and that they are justifying the persecution on the ground that "the law must be enforced because it is law"—in the face of all these plain and indisputable facts, they keep up their parrot chatter about the "duty" of enforcing all laws—although they at the same time know that there are thousands of dead laws in the books—and pour out their sickening adulation on officials who admit that the laws they are enforcing with so much simulated virtue are crimes against the guaranteed civil rights and equal liberty of the citizens of the town and state and nation. These editors are blind leaders, but they are likely to make the discovery that all the people are not their blind followers. The manufacture of political capital can become too open an industry.

The Catholic Union and Times says that the continued cruelties of the Turks and the Chinese "upon inoffensive heralds of the cross cry to heaven for vengeance." How about turning the other cheek, Father Cronin? But of course it is too much to expect Christians to practice what they preach. Then, again, it would seem that if God really wants the world to be converted to Christianity he would take some effective means of protecting the "inoffensive heralds" whom he has "called" to do the work. It is very easy to call upon "Christian" governments to punish the "heathens" for the killing of Christian missionaries, but if the church controlled the governments, as she once did, who would insure even for one day the lives of heathen missionaries in Christian lands?

"Pray, pay, and praise are three very religious p's. Do you use them freely, reader?"—The Soldier.

Observation and history show that the Christian prefers to use those three other p's—prejudice, prevaricate, and persecute.

"Things are queerly mixed in some parts of this city. They are mixed in the two blocks of Lafayette place. At one end of it is the excellent statue of the Rev. Father Drumgoole, the 'Newsboys' Friend.' Near the other end of it is the charming See House of Bishop Potter, opposite to which are the offices of an Infidel paper, a Prohibitionist paper, a Socialist paper, and two papers for tailors."—New York Sun.

And the Infidel paper, THE TRUTH SEEKER, is the best of all of them, even if Roman Catholic Postmaster-General Caron of Canada doesn't like it.

"In this free land of ours when ecclesiastical authority is exercised so as to control the rights of citizens, or abridge the privileges of citizenship, it is time for us to inquire whereunto the thing will grow."—Nashville Christian Advocate.

That sounds good, and yet the Christian Advocate favors Sabbath laws, exemption of church property from taxation, and most if not all the other means whereby "ecclesiastical authority controls the rights of citizens and abridges the privileges of citizenship." Fair words are often used only to deceive.

Detroit is in the grasp of the Sundayites; closing there is more complete than in New York. The Civic Federation (evidently the Sabbath Union under a less offensive name) "took up the matter of a quiet and law-abiding Sabbath observance and enlisted all the young people of the Christian Endeavor and other societies." These young folks are taking their initial lessons in the degrading and criminal school of the spy and informer. It will be noticed that this closing crusade is frankly for "Sabbath observance," meaning, for the observance of Sunday as a religious holy day; not for the "Sunday rest" hypocritically demanded in the asserted interest of the "laborer," crushed under the ruthless feet of "brutal monopolists." What a sham this "rest" pretext is!

The Christian Reformer opines that "the greatest boon the civil power could confer" on the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER "would be to cut off their supply of congenial pabulum and thus induce them to seek something more wholesome, both mentally and morally." The prescription is a very simple one, but it is not new. Persecuting doctors of divinity have always made a large use of it in their practice. The Catholic nostrum-dispensers long believed that it was a "sure cure" for the Bible-reading malady, and so they forbade the circulating of that volume, trusting that those who found such "pabulum" "congenial," on discovering that "their supply" was "cut off," would "seek something more wholesome, both mentally and morally." We extend our sincere felicitations to the Presbyterian editor, for we know that he must greatly enjoy his home-coming. At last, back under the dear old roof-tree of Holy Mother Church, he can crawl into the cradle where in its infancy his creed was rocked and "ask once again for the rattle and the bib" of the original Christian superstition and tyranny. Rome is gathering her wandering children back into her capacious arms.

"It is supremacy, not precedence, that we ask for the Bible; it is contrast, as well as resemblance, that we must feel compelled to insist on. The Bible is stamped with specialty of origin, and an immeasurable distance separates it from all competitors."—W. E. Gladstone.

It is very kind and considerate of Mr. Gladstone to do no more than ask for supremacy for the Bible. Here, in the United States, and also in England, his fellow Christians are in the habit of demanding that the people who do not believe the book is of divine origin be taxed to pay for the teaching of its doctrines in the public schools. In fact, it is only recently that they have become modest enough to make a respectful request that it be considered on its literary and historical merits. Hitherto it was a "thus saith the Lord," "believe or be damned." But it is more than the science and the critical scholarship of the age will grant—the asked-for supremacy for the Bible. It must take its place among other books as a human production. The Nashville Christian Advocate hopes that the utterance of the ex-Premier of England will "strengthen the spinal column of some preaching brother or layman who is inclined to be panicky in the face of foes that have been routed again and again." The way in which the Christian champions have "routed again and again" the critics of the Bible is by "again and again" accepting the results of the critics' investigations and then claiming that they always believed that way themselves!

"To dare to apply the law of Christ to any public question is said to be a uniting of church and state, and that is regarded as a treasonable offense under the Constitution of the United States. The secret of all these attacks on Christian missionaries and Christian reformers is antagonism to the truths of the divine word."—Christian Reformer.

The attempt of the theocrats to incorporate the doctrines of the church in the Constitution and laws is an attempt to unite church and state, and the union of church and state is treason to the secular Constitution. If it is not treason, why are the theocrats trying to amend the Constitution? The opposition to the schemes of the theocrats is caused by our knowledge of the evils that flow from the union of the civil and the ecclesiastical, and by our love of religious liberty, not by any hatred of such truths as the Bible may contain. It ill becomes the Christian Reformer to talk of hatred of the truths of the Bible, while it is expending every energy it can command in the endeavor to compel the citizens of the United States to observe Sunday as the Sabbath, when it well knows that the Bible does not recognize that day as the Sabbath, and that Jesus, Paul, and James protest against a compulsory Sabbath of any kind.

"Bob Ingersoll's pocket was picked in Missouri the other day of $250 in cash and a draft for $700. What will he say of this? He cannot blame the man, for, if Ingersoll's logic be right, the man has offended no law, there being no standard by which we can condemn the pickpocket, since he had a chance to get the money and got it. There cannot be a moral law unless it has some great head, and, as Ingersoll's argument is that there is no great head, each man has the right to be a law unto himself. Go for him again, slick-finger! Pluck him just after he has done one of his high-sounding talks on beauty and while the cash is there in his inside pocket!"—Richmond State.

And yet, in the face of such evidence as this, there are people who maintain that man was originally perfect! Who can believe that the descendants of a perfect man and woman could ever have fallen into such intellectual and moral depths as that in which this Virginia editor is hopelessly floundering? On the other hand, there is nothing strange in this phenomenon if we accept the evolutionary hypothesis of man's origin and development, for that recognizes the fact that not all men in human form have advanced along parallel lines; some are enlightened, some only civilized, while still others are in the semi-civilized, the barbarian, and the savage stages, and some are still lower, for, as Dr. Frederick R. Marvin aptly says—it would seem prophetically—"There are paths of development behind the ape, and there are men who tread them."

"To what extent is Christ the light of the world? Is he simply a teacher of men? I find it no easy task to be as patient as I ought to be with the shallowness of men who think and speak of Christ only as a great pedagogue, making men better simply by making them wiser. It is based on the unwarranted assumption that sin is not a very serious matter, born solely of ignorance. That it is lodged solely in the intellect, and that the easy and certain cure for it is education."—Rev. Dr. J. B. Hawthorne, Baptist, of Atlanta.

Does not Mr. Hawthorne know that true education cultivates the whole man? Is he unaware of the fact that the ignorance in which the scientific observer and thinker finds the roots of all "sin" is not merely deficiency of intellectual knowledge, but moral poverty as well? He is ignorant who does not know how to live with his neighbors with the least possible friction, no less than he who does not know the primary branches of school science. All "sin" is malformation, miseducation, or mal-adjustment, and education is the only preventiv. No person of sense claims that "sin" (injury of self or others) is "not a very serious matter;" that statement is an orthodox travesty of the Rationalistic idea. The constant struggle of man is to escape from "sin" and the imperfections of external nature, but it is mental and moral insanity to claim that the mistakes he makes through ignorance, and under the spur of imperious desires, merit an eternity of pain, and that nothing can save him from that hell of agony but belief in the sufficiency of the sacrifice of an unoffending man-god.

When Cardinal Gibbons returned from Rome recently, he said, in an interview, in which he was asked what the Pope thought of affairs in the United States:

"He believes fully in the custom of the American Congress of opening the sessions with prayer, and considers that a government in which religion has such a high standing is on a sure foundation."

It was unnecessary for Leo to make either of these statements, or for Cardinal Gibbons to repeat them to the attentive reporter. It goes without saying that the pope approves of any custom or law that tends to the union of church and state, and that he thinks that a government that stands with its hat off to, and its hand in the public treasury for the benefit of the church is "on a sure foundation." It is out of the recognition of the power of the priesthood, which public prayers give evidence of, that the church gets satisfaction, for the prayers themselves are the most perfunctory performances imaginable, listened to with ill-concealed impatience by a large number of the members, and escaped from by others by absenteeism. They add no dignity to the services of religion, they reflect no credit on those who are responsible for them, and they emphasize the low moral standard of the church, which is willing and eager to take the money of dissenters by unconstitutional legislation and use it for the purpose of propagating the creed of a sect.

A man named Marable was convicted of murder in Virginia. It was thought by some that he was innocent, or, at least, that when a woman who was to be tried later was put on the stand, with her witnesses, it would be shown that Marable was not chiefly responsible for the crime. So Father Welbers tried to induce Governor O'Ferrall to grant a respite until after the trial of the woman. This the governor refused to do, fearing that if the respite were granted there would be a resort to lynch law. The priest, describing his interview with the convicted man after his failure to secure the postponement, says:

"At last I said: 'Marable, what do you think now?' He did not answer me for several minutes, but at last he lifted his head and said: 'The Lord's will be done,' adding with a deep sigh, 'but it's unjust.'"

"I believe it's unjust, and that Marable deserves his sentence no more than the engineer and fireman of the train that was held up last fall deserve to share the sentence of Morgan."

"The Lord's will be done, but it's unjust!" How much that tells of the righteous revolt of the human against the infamous doctrine of the divine justice, which, so far as we are concerned, is a pure fiction. If Marable is hanged, and if the priest still thinks that the sentence was unjust, how will he reconcile this miscarriage of justice with his belief that his god is a just god? As an educated man, the priest must recognize that while there was always room for honest error in the verdict of the jury and the refusal of Governor O'Ferrall to interfere, no such excuse avails in the case of a god of unlimited knowledge and power. Why should a man of thought and of generous impulses cling to a creed adapted only to savages in the animistic stage of development? Why does he not step out into light and liberty?

Call for the Annual Congress.

NEW YORK, OCTOBER 25TH, 26TH, AND 27TH.

To the Liberals of America, Members of the Freethought Federation and Secular Union, and all Societies organized for the Purpose of maintaining a purely Secular Government:

It is of great importance that Freethinkers should combine. It is of more importance now than at any previous period, for there is more work to do and the work cannot be done by isolated effort. There are vast ecclesiastical combinations organized for the express purpose of overthrowing Freethought, and also of uniting church and state in a more dangerous form than ever before. These questions immediately confront us:

The Taxation of Church Property,
The Bible in the Public Schools,
The Sabbath Laws, and
The Liberty of the Press.

Property to the value of a billion of dollars is exempt from taxation in the American Republic, in many places religious exercises in the public schools are on the increase, and the very foundation of universal education is being destroyed. The conflict in regard to Sabbath laws is now waged both in the states and in the national Congress, and a centralized political power is being established for the purpose of aggrandizing the authority of the church in civil matters; and honest Freethinkers are imprisoned to-day for discussing questions of the utmost importance to human improvement. Against these flagrant and ever accumulating acts of injustice we must unitedly contend. Freethinkers throughout the Union, in every state, county, city, and village, should be in active communication, and ready to meet at any point the encroachments of the church. It is often the case that a Freethinker is alone in his community in the open support of Liberal thought and principles, and for this reason suffers persecutions. Religious bigots assume that they can trample upon the Freethinker's rights with impunity on account of their own vast majority.

When it is well understood that the Freethinkers of this country are joined together and will defend one another at all hazards, the rights of Freethought will be respected and the individual Freethinker will have the power of numbers to support his cause. The theologian is naturally a coward. He persecutes only the minority. He does not trust in God unless God has a big majority. When the theologian realizes that the Freethinker is not a solitary unit, but the representative of a great force, he will not only cease his persecutions, but even welcome him to social equality. A theologian is very considerate towards a powerful party, however much he despises the humble citizen.

There is a great contest before us. We must be an organized party or submit to defeat and ostracism. We cannot fold our hands and do nothing. We must become an intellectual, social, moral, and political power through a generous and permanent comradeship. We can do this only by public meetings, congresses, associations, and a Freethought press. We must use the same instrumentalities that are constantly used by the churches. They have their great gatherings, their synods, their councils, their conventions, and in this way the churches create an immense enthusiasm and exercise a more potent sway. These are human, practical, and far-reaching means, and Freethought must avail itself of such necessary aids.

All, therefore, are urged to come together at the National Congress of the American Secular Union and the Freethought Federation of America, to be held in New York, October 25th, 26th, and 27th, 1895.

It is hoped that there will be a large attendance, and that measures of co-operation, greater advance and usefulness will be adopted and cordially carried out by friends of freedom throughout the country.

The members of the American Secular Union are notified that such amendments to the Constitution will be proposed at the coming Congress as will enable the Union to consolidate with the Freethought Federation of America.

The members of the Freethought Federation are also notified that changes of the same nature will be proposed for its Constitution in order that it may unite as an organized body with the American Secular Union.

It is the general desire that there be one grand national organization adapted to all the needs of the present and future work. Without doubt this will be determined in a wise, conciliatory, and progressive spirit. Let us close our ranks and meet the common enemy, the bigots of the Christian church. We work for the future; we work for humanity; we work for the best interests of civilization, for the liberty and the progress of all. Let us stand bravely by our colors and unite in the common cause. There are vast and profound principles which should harmonize superficial differences. We have no creed to support, but always and everywhere the rights of man. This is the mighty battleground. Let us rally now as never before, with earnest convictions, courage, and enthusiasm. We cannot evade the issue, neither can the church itself. It is liberty or it is slavery. This is the conflict of the ages, and in the American Republic all that is most precious and ennobling is at stake.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM, President.

The Brotherhood of Man.

To an observer of the human mind as manifested in all phases of the history of thought, the clash and din of diverse creeds, the thunder of the parsons and the shouting, and the fanaticism and religious intolerance of the present day afford a singular prospect.

"God is love," we are told in holy writ. The palpably inconsistent statement that "God is a consuming fire" is also found in the same holy writ. Is he both? Possibly he consumes us with the fire of love. I fancy the inquisitor-general kindled many such fires.

"Peace on earth, good will toward men," rings out from the pulpit, and the good book heralds forth the promise, "I came not to bring peace, but a sword." There is much of this sword doctrine in the Bible. But which did he bring? The testimony of the written page tells too well the story. Was it a sword? We are answered by the groans of millions who perished on many a gory field; by the wailing of orphans, and by the shrieking victims of dread Bartholomew's day, whose echoes reach us mingled with the doleful reverberation of te deums. Is God a consuming fire? Go read the page of history, illumined by the fires of Smithfield and written in the blood of martyrs.

All this is the result of a doctrine which exalts the love of an intangible deity above that of father and mother, and the veneration of saints above the idols of the household. Is it any wonder that men so instructed should become hardened to all the feelings of humanity, callous to the supplications of innocence, and fit only for acts of unfeeling barbarity?

Take the church, with her record of murder and rapine; her long and inglorious warfare with science, from Galileo to Darwin; and yet in none of these was she more infamous than in her pitiless effort to stifle love, the sweetest emotion known to the human heart. But the church was not without scriptural authority: "If any man come to me and hate not his father and mother, and wife, and children, and brethren, and sisters, yea, and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple" (Luke xiv, 26). Such expressions come with fitting grace from one who says, "I am come to send fire on the earth" (Luke xii, 49), and that he will be "revealed from heaven with his mighty angels, in flaming fire taking vengeance on them that know not God" (2 Thess. i, 8). "Cursed be he that keepeth back his sword from blood," saith the Lord (Jere. xlviii, 10). These debasing doctrines, impressed upon the morbid brains of enthusiasts, are well calculated to destroy all love for humanity.

St. Paul, who first placed a premium on celibacy, opposed matrimony, and all those sentiments which lead to it. He says (1 Cor. vii, 1), "It is good for a man not to touch a woman." "Nevertheless," he continues, "to avoid fornication let every man have his own wife, and let every woman have her own husband." Filthy and abominable, this sentence may well bring the flush of honest indignation to the cheek of every man who possesses an atom of love or respect for woman. Is this the sole justification of marriage? We hope not. Again (1 Cor. vii, 9), the same saintly philosopher suggests the alternative of marriage, rather than "burn." He also says: "He that giveth her in marriage doeth better" (1 Cor. vii, 38). Little marvel that St. Paul was a bachelor!

It is time we were setting aside the antiquated doctrines of fear and hate, and substituting for them something that will give happiness. Let there be tolerance, friendship, love. We are all brothers, living on the same little planet; pilgrims, as it were, all traveling toward the same country—a country that lies beyond the dark waters—and why rend asunder the golden chain of friendship? The short years of life soon pass away, and then we part. It is well to live in peace while we are here. Maladies which baffle the skill of physicians often vanish before a smile, a friendly grasp of the hand, or a kind word or two. In this world there are weeping eyes; faces wan and wasted by the afflictions of years; human beings dying for a gentle look, or a friendly deed.

The religion of this country is a sham, an empty shell, a "gilded halo hovering 'round decay." It has caused more enmities than friendships, and broken up far more homes than it has united. Parsons will talk of the poor—whom they recognize in public only when no one is looking. Female reformers will arise in church and descendant upon the sufferings of the masses; but should a poor man accost one of them upon the street, she would draw her righteous skirts about her, elevate her patrician nose, and sweep grandly on.

All this must change. Freethought is thumping at the door of the human mind, and will never cease till the supremacy of conscience shall be established, with that ideal of the centuries, the universal brotherhood of man.

SPENCER MOSBY.
Jefferson City, Mo.

Those Missionary "Martyrs."

Let the missionaries go to China if they will, or to any other part of the globe. Where they go is their own business, as long as they take the risk themselves. But when they clamor for protection, we have a right to see whether they deserve it. If they go into the mission-field in the spirit of martyrdom, we shall respect their motives, however we may suspect their wisdom. But they cannot enjoy the double privilege of martyrdom and citizenship. Let them make their choice. If their attack on the heathen has to be supported by gunboats, it is obvious that their enterprise is not "spiritual." They must be enrolled as ordinary traders.

The fact is, the missionaries are not invited, and are not welcome. They force themselves upon the heathen. And in doing so they expect—and when possible exact—a tolerance which they would never exhibit themselves. Just imagine what would happen if the Chinese sent missionaries to England! Brutal attacks have been made at Liverpool upon a little body of Mohammedans, who do not go out into the streets to proselytize, but confine themselves to their own mosque. And it must be remembered that nearly a hundred million Mohammedans are subjects of the British empire. Nay, we need not take such an extreme illustration. Christians here, in the United Kingdom, brutally ill-treat each other. Take the following newspaper report of an occurrence in Ireland on Sunday, August 25th:

On the street preachers making their reappearance at Sligo yesterday they were beset by a large and violent crowd, and, despite the efforts of a hundred police, they were assaulted with stones, rotten eggs, and filth, so that in a short time their clothes were completely spoiled. Several policemen were struck by stones, but not seriously injured. After three-quarters of an hour the missionaries were escorted to their lodgings by the police.

Rotten eggs and ordure show contempt, stones show hatred, and bloodshed shows the spirit of murder. Only withdraw the police, and dead bodies would strew the ground.

Suppose the preachers at Sligo were foreigners, with strange dress and manners; suppose they spoke in ridiculous broken English, and at the same time gave themselves airs of immense superiority; suppose they told the people that they would all go to hell unless they accepted the preachers' creed, whether they understood it or not; and suppose they broadly hinted that they had powerful friends in the country they came from, who might come with war-ships and big guns if the people did not behave themselves. Does any man in his right senses imagine that this would not incense the people terribly, and that some of the most fierce and fanatical would not be provoked to deeds of violence?

O wad some pow'r the giftie gie us
To see ourselves as ithers see us!

Christianity is the most intolerant religion that ever disgraced the earth. It has shed oceans of blood, and it still persecutes wherever it has the power. What right has such a religion to make such a fuss about the consumption (as Gibbon would call it) of a few missionaries? And when the consumption occurs in China, where Christian England has forced a big opium trade in spite of the protests of the Chinese government, the howling of the Christians is enough to shake the world with laughter.—G. W. Foote, in the Freethinker.

News and Notes.

Again upon the lovely ocean, and homeward bound. Again the shores sink from view, and again the mighty ship, plunging through the glistening billows, is for the time being the bounded world of humanity.

The past summer appears a dream floating before the mind's eye like a wondrous panorama. In the sunshine, beneath the boundless heavens, we muse and meditate, while with soft, continuous thunder through blue depths the huge vessel speeds with flying banners. It is beautiful, serene, rejoicing, all the shining expanse, while fresh winds give vigor and elasticity to the frame; while, as the sea itself, the mind sparkles with a thousand thoughts. Like a mirror it reflects the gorgeous scene. This is pure happiness, a diamond-like existence, without burden, without care. An ocean voyage is poetry, music, romance. We are borne along whether we will or no, and abandon ourselves with inexpressible delight to the changing glory of wave and sky.

Farewell to England, to its ancient grandeur, its accumulated wealth of centuries, its blossom in to-day's life of a thousand years of toil. The "golden eloquence" of Shakspeare was never so deeply felt. The more we appreciate England the better we understand all the world.

This sceptred isle,
This earth of majesty, this seat of Mars,
This other Eden, demi-paradise,
This fortress built by nature for herself
Against infection and the hand of war,
This happy breed of men, this little world,
This precious stone set in the silver sea.

The last two weeks seemed to go like a flash. I can only give a glimpse of these crowded days. It was as if the hand of time was turning a kaleidoscope, and each moment presented a new picture.

I spent an evening with Edward Truelove, the oldest Freethinker in the world, I guess. He is in his eighty-fifth year. He is like a mountain, over whose face have passed the storms of conflict, but is now shining in rugged serenity. He has always shown great courage in the publication of radical books, and has suffered imprisonment therefor. He gave me many reminiscences of his extraordinary experiences, and I realized more than ever the savage nature of that Christian theology which still sways in the laws of England. The tortures of imprisonment are but little understood. It is a living death. Man is treated like a machine. Every right is violated. It is bad enough when criminals are thus treated; but what shall we say when those who are devoted to the improvement of mankind are compelled to endure this terrific ordeal? We cannot too highly honor those who, like Holyoake, Truelove, Bennett, and Foote, have conquered through these depths of solitary suffering. They have given to our time a noble realm, but at an awful cost, which we are sometimes apt to forget in the enjoyments of these happy days.

Mr. and Mrs. Truelove celebrated their golden wedding about five weeks ago. At their home at Hornsey they still give welcome to Freethought friends. In Mr. Truelove's library, gathered through many years from his bookstore, are rare Freethought publications, not to be found even in the British Museum. He has portraits of Godwin, Hetherington, Watson, etc. He has the table upon which Thomas Paine wrote the "Rights of Man," which bears an inscription recording the fact, placed there by Clio Rickman, who owned the table when Mr. Truelove first saw it in his early manhood at Rickman's house. In after years, by strange coincidences, it came into Truelove's possession. Mr. Truelove also showed me a picture of Paine's iron bridge, the first iron bridge built on this planet, and which still arches the river at Sunderland. Many phases of the world's history flashed before me in my brief visit with this remarkable veteran, whose life has spanned so much of the nineteenth century.

Liverpool is my next lecturing field, August 25th, and here I again receive a hearty Lancashire welcome. The hall is full in the evening, and though the challenge for debate is given, no Christian opponents appear. They seem to be discouraged, or perhaps they will resort to guerrilla warfare and attack the lecturer when he is far across the Atlantic. Liverpool has a varied and interesting Freethought element, which branches out in manifold directions—literature, science, politics, and philosophy. Mr. Ernest Newman has fine promise in the field of art and criticism, for he has the faculty of appreciation and the talent of expression. Mr. Lawrence Small, Mr. Wollett, Mr. Roberts, Mr. Towers, Secretary Doeg, the Balfour brothers, etc., are generously equipped for the service. Liverpool is not an easy field. It demands work and expenditure. There are so many forces in play here that Freethought must watch and win its chance. All sorts of "isms" are on the move. Liverpool is more like Chicago than any other city I know of. It is comparatively modern, and there is no ancient flavor about it. It is a city of to-day. It has something of the rush and roar of Western life, and lacks the oriental ease of time-honored institutions. It has not even an old cathedral, but must build a new one. Liverpool, therefore, like Chicago, is open to all kinds of influences, tendencies, commotions, and reforms. It is not tied down. It has no deep roots into the mighty past, like London and Edinburgh. No knights, no castles, haunt the memories of Liverpool. She is pre-eminently the "child of the sea." From "watery Neptune" she derives her pomp and pride and circumstance.

Liverpool takes its name from the Welsh; the words Llŷr pool, signifying "place of the pool." The "Domesday Book" does not contain the name of Liverpool. In King John's time it was only a fishing village. During the reign of King Edward the First it had only 800 inhabitants. In 1347, when levies were made by Edward III. upon London for 25 ships and 662 men, Bristol 22 ships and 608 men, Hull 16 ships and 466 men, for the war against France, Liverpool was required to furnish only one bark and six men. In Queen Elizabeth's time the place is described as "her majesty's poor decayed town of Liverpool." In 1634, when Charles I. made his levy of ship money, Liverpool was let off with £15, while Chester paid £100 and Bristol £1,000. The Liverpool of modern times began about 1738. In 1800 the population was 77,000; in 1868, 500,000; to-day, with the incorporation of surrounding municipalities the "Greater Liverpool" will enroll a population of over one million. It will thus be seen that Liverpool is mainly a city of the nineteenth century, and with its marvelous and widespread trade possesses the characteristics of this teeming age, having much of the dash and energy and comprehensive spirit of the great cities of America. I find a good deal of the Yankee in this ocean-nurtured metropolis. Farewell to Liverpool. I hope to see again its spacious docks, its thousand flags, its villas and mansions, its handsome parks and gardens, its noble Mersey, and its brilliant Freethinkers, who will certainly keep these busy shores illuminated with reason and liberty.

Margate flows on the vision next—Margate by the sea, one of the "peculiar institutions" of England. We might say of it, "Age cannot wither, nor custom stale, its infinite variety." One would miss quite a picture of English outdoor life if he did not go to Margate and its brilliant surroundings, Ramsgate, Broadstairs, etc. Broadstairs was one of the favorite abodes of Dickens, where he wrote "Bleak House." It is certainly a lovely place for meditation and romance. I went down with Foote and Watts, and we surrendered ourselves to the beauty of sea and land, and roamed through realms of lively enchantment. The moment you strike Margate you are in the midst of a big crowd. It seems as if everybody was coming there. You wander to the beach, and it is covered with thousands of people. All sorts of shows are rampant—the minstrels, the shooting-galleries, the phrenological lecturer, the donkeys, etc. Hundreds of children with bare legs splash through the waters, digging holes in the sand or building castles. The "machines" go in and out; the boats fly; the steamships roll, packed to the brim, and far away spreads the immensity of the ocean with its million flashing waves. It is a vast and animated scene. Everybody is happy, and abandons himself to the impulse of the moment. It is the fashion to do as you please. Nature smiles with exhilarating changefulness. The sunshine is gorgeous, and the houses and streets are bathed in splendor, and wherever you look there is the joy of untrammelled life. It does people good to come to these great, bright, beautiful shores and be "real folks," to be as outspoken and rollicking as the sea itself. It is health to the whole man, body and brain, this wild and wondrous motion of the waters; this glory of the heavens; this free, democratic, cheerful, luminous intermingling of all sorts and conditions of humanity on the broad level spaces of the spangled shores upon which the sea-god pours his brightest jewels.

Great coaches, with "four-in-hand," speed from Margate to Ramsgate, and it is a charming drive. For a while we leave the blue ocean behind. Green fields and groves, beautiful gardens, and delightful homes, clothed with ivy and roses, expand upon the view. Then again the ocean appears as we dash down the declivity into the bustling town. Ramsgate, if anything, is more jubilant than Margate. At some portions of our way we can scarcely push along, so intricate is the multitude. We reach the immense pier, from which there is an extensive view of sea and shore. For miles the chalk cliffs stretch their battlements in white radiance. We see the cloudy lands of Dover, where King Lear once walked, and beyond, in the keen sunset, can sometimes be discerned the faint outlines of the hills of France. From the pier we journey to the lofty walls, where Hotel Granville fronts the main, one of the most beautiful hotels I have ever seen. It is more picturesque than most buildings of the kind. There is an element of poetry in its architecture. It has towers and turrets and spacious roofs. It is not all straight up and down, but there are curved lines and sunlit spaces, where, in ordinary hotels, is confinement and gloom. It is in harmony, I think, with its environments, the tall cliffs, the vast sea, the glowing heights shadowed by stately groves.

In the moonlight and starlight, through dim majestic pictures, we return to Margate, to Terrace Hotel, and Hearts of Oak restaurant, which are along the Marine Drive. We receive a jolly welcome, for the landlord is S. H. Munns, an old-time Freethinker, side by side with Bradlaugh, and always ready to do his level best. Our appetite is good, and the dinner is delightful. After the dinner we sit upon the broad portico, with the sea before and the stars above, while below the crowds pace along the brilliant streets, and occasional music bursts athwart the electric lights, and the tide comes glistening in, until all the sandy spaces shine with lustrous waves. Amidst these bewitching surroundings, with nature and the human heart in magnetic attraction, we indulge in reminiscences of the past, of Bradlaugh's mighty battle, with whom my confrères had fought and won, and whose spirit still walks abroad, unchained by death and burning in the thoughts of to-day and to-morrow. How wonderfully life expands when we thus look on the limitless sea and the limitless stars. It was a glorious night. I shall not forget its manifold scenes, its stars and waves, its circling lamps, its murmuring people, its joyous companionship, its music of hope, "ring out the old, ring in the new."

On the morrow we drive to Broadstairs, and thence walk along the margin of the sea to Ramsgate. It is beautiful, the tall cliffs for our pathway, the sea a hundred feet beneath, murmuring and glistening on miles of shore with faint melody, while like little fairies almost seem the people that wander up and down; and the great blue spreads beyond in immeasurable glory, while on the other side masses of green fields and golden harvests mingle with the dark splendor of groves. We pass around the magnificent estate of the noble Montefiore, the philanthropist who made all the world his country. It was a place where one's mind might be filled with great and beautiful ideas, so broad and universal is the aspect nature presents. It is enough to make us boys again, and when we come across a venerable man who might be Merlin or any other bearded vision of antiquity, whose only means of living was a cocoanut gallery, it behooved us of course to try a hand. You pay a penny a shot. If you hit the cocoanut, the cocoanut is yours. If not the old man is a penny ahead. Only one of us made out to hit the cocoanut, but it was good exercise, and made us breathe the atmosphere of youth. This is one of the favorite games along the seashore. From Ramsgate we pursue a roundabout course to Margate, where we again refresh the inner man at the Heart of Oak restaurant, bid farewell to our comrade and host, Mr. S. H. Munns, and his wife, and return to London, beneath the illuminations of the harvest moon.

On Saturday my good friend of Wales memory, Mr. Horatio Montefiore, takes me to another sea resort, Bognor. This is down towards Portsmouth. We ride through a beautiful country, great hills on either side crowned with bountiful forest, with here and there a castellated mansion; anon the noble structure of Arundel appears and the vast cathedral built for the Catholic church by the duke of Norfolk; all amidst scenery of magnificent loveliness. It is wonderful how green the landscapes are in England at this season. It is like the freshness of springtime. The fields fairly glitter. There is nothing like it in America except in June. After June the sober brown, with harvest gold, begins to prevail. But in England it is still a brilliant green flashing against the dazzling harvest and "cloth of gold" of innumerable buttercups. They say that there is a still more brilliant green in Ireland. If so, it must be a fascinating land indeed, a jewel "set in the silver sea." These vivid colors seem almost like music as they strike the vision. If there is such a thing as a "symphony of colors" then England and Ireland are attuned to glorious melody, with these emerald hues at the gateways of summer and autumn. Bognor is not like Margate. It is a different picture of English life, quiet and attractively. There are no crowds here, no rush and turmoil. The broad sea is before you—the lovely beach, with two or three hundred people roaming leisurely along, and children at play. It is a pleasing scene if one wants perfect rest. It animates and soothes. At Margate you must be on the go; you must keep up with the procession. At Bognor you can float away in dreams; you can take things easy. There is just enough excitement to tingle the blood while allowing you to sink away in delicious slumber. There is good companionship here. If one wants a bower of paradise he will find it at Victoria hotel, Mr. E. Lawford-Webb proprietor. You have the best of everything, with all the loveliness of country life about you, and, when you desire, the far-off glistening sea mingles with the radiance of tree and flower and grass. Mr. and Mrs. W. Taylor extend their hospitality to the American visitor, and the merry children also animate the circle. Lawn tennis adds its variable fortunes and dancing colors to the charm and music of the sea. I had a thoroughly enjoyable day. I have not found any of that "British reserve" yet. So far as my experience goes the Britons are as open, generous, and hospitable as the typical Westerner himself. They will give you a good hearty handshake, and make you feel at home with frankness and joviality. The elegance of civilization does not diminish the real humanity of the Briton. He has too much business with all the world to be a provincial. Those who do the work in England, who keep its commerce, trade, literature, science, on the move, are those who give the stranger a generous welcome. I must thank my friend Montefiore for a happy introduction to English good-fellowship, and for the enjoyment of noble sceneries. I hope America can sometime repay these delightful experiences. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

To the Freethinkers of America.

Having returned from Great Britain I am now ready for work in America. The first thing is the National Freethought Congress to be held in October at New York, Hardman's Hall, corner of 19th street and Fifth avenue, a handsome and commodious hall, of easy access, in the central part of the city. We expect to have a grand gathering, especially of the Eastern Liberals. I hope that every one will do his best for this Congress. Be present, and aid us, and send funds if able. The Liberals of New York have nobly responded to the call. Let all do the same and success is assured. The object of the Congress is to enlighten the people, create a wide interest in Freethought, and arrange plans for work. I hope that every Freethinker throughout the entire country will lend his aid. Let the West join with the East in generous support. The following are the contributions already made:

Mr. Putnam's Farewell to Albion.

From the London Freethinker.

Early in May I went down to Southampton with Mr. Charles Watts to meet Mr. S. P. Putnam, the president of the American Secular Union, who had come over from the great Western republic to see this little isle set in the silver sea, and to salute his Freethought comrades in the land which produced Thomas Paine and Charles Bradlaugh. On the first Sunday in May I took the chair at Mr. Putnam's first lecture; on the first Sunday in September I took the chair at his last lecture. During the intervening four months he had "done" England and Scotland as few Americans have the opportunity of "doing" it in such a brief time. He had visited most of our principal cities, from Plymouth to Aberdeen; he had seen a great deal of our finest landscapes, and he had inspected many places of ancient historic interest, from a crumbling old Durham church to the stately fane of Westminster, where lie the ashes of old kings and warriors, and men of light and leading, whose names sparkle forever like jewels on the forefinger of time. He had lectured to enthusiastic meetings of Freethinkers, and had everywhere been received with the most generous hospitality. And everywhere he had made friends by his geniality, good-fellowship, and racy Yankee humor. And when the last few days of his stay with us arrived, it was but fitting that we should entertain him, as Britishers love to entertain their friends, at a good dinner; not the paltry dish of herbs which Solomon thought better than a beef-steak with wrangling, but a real square meal, ample and satisfactory, such as might prompt a man to say:

Not e'en the gods upon the past have power,
And what has been has been, and I have had my hour.

Well, the dinner to Mr. Putnam came off on Wednesday, September 4th, at the Holborn Restaurant. The repast was, of course, all that could be desired. There is nothing shabby at that establishment. And the company was representative. Naturally, most of them were Londoners, but a few were up from the country. Mr. Gillespie came from Newcastle, and Mr. Sydney Gimson from Leicester. Mr. G. J. Holyoake, the veteran, came up from Brighton. But he was not the only veteran present. There was Mr. Edward Truelove, a hero and a martyr of free speech, born in the same year as Mr. Gladstone. There was also Mr. George Anderson, a rare mixture of shrewdness and benevolence, whose memory goes back to the days of Robert Owen. He loved and admired Charles Bradlaugh, but he is broad-minded enough to continue his support to the movement under new conditions. Mr. Charles Watts belongs to a younger generation, though time is thinning his locks and sprinkling them with gray, without quenching his eloquence or dulling his fire in debate. Mr. Couzeau Parris was there, with his well-stored mind, his ready tongue, and his sagacity enlivened with smiles. Mr. Robert Forder, the faithful old secretary of the National Secular Society; Miss Vance, his new and energetic colleague; Mr. A. B. Moss and Mr. W. Heaford, who have fought so long and gallantly in the open-air lecture field; Mr. James Rowney, who is winning laurels in the same warfare; and last, but not least, my dear old friend and co-worker, Mr. J. M. Wheeler; all these and scores of others met around the festive board, which was graced by the presence of well-dressed, smiling ladies, who were brave enough to be Freethinkers. Mr. Putnam sat on my right, looking plumper and jollier, if that were possible, than when he landed on the shores of old England.

After the dinner came the speech-making. My own address as chairman was, I trust, suitable to the occasion. Mr. Holyoake followed in a speech marked by felicitous diction, and containing a highly-finished eulogy of Colonel Ingersoll, as well as a handsome tribute to Mr. Putnam. Mr. Sydney Gimson, who spoke for the provinces, was bright and telling. He also hoped that Colonel Ingersoll would come over to England, but, whether he came or not, the Freethinkers of this country had learnt to admire and love Mr. Putnam for his own sake, and did not merely regard him as a John the Baptist to a Jesus Christ. Mr. Parris was wise and witty. His brief speech bristled with good points. Mr. Watts finished the flow of English eloquence with characteristic dignity, and then Mr. Putnam rose to respond to the toast of his health. The whole company rose with him and cheered him to the echo. It was impossible for flesh and blood to be unmoved at such a greeting. Mr. Putnam was visibly affected, but his platform training served him in good stead, and he launched out into a really brilliant speech, abounding in humor, pathos, and nervous eloquence. When he sat down the applause was worth hearing. I only wish it could have been heard by our comrades in America.

Some music on the piano, a few capital songs, and an inimitably-rendered satirical reading by Mrs. Charles Watts, added to the general enjoyment. Finally, there came an impromptu addition to the official program. Mr. George Anderson proposed the health of the President of the National Secular Society, in a generous little speech, which was heartily applauded. After the president's response, the company broke up with "Auld Lang Syne." Then came a lot of handshaking; in fact, it must have made Mr. Putnam sore for several days.

Mr. Watts and I spent Friday evening with Mr. Putnam, and the next day Mr. Watts saw him off at Waterloo Station, I having to travel to Scotland.

Thus ends a most interesting episode in the recent history of the Freethought movement in England. Mr. Putnam has returned to the land of his birth, but he has made an indelible impression upon the Freethinkers of England. They like his eloquence, and they love his personality. He carries with him their unanimous good-wishes. They hope he will live long to lead the army of Freethought in America, and they also hope he will come over again to old England. Whenever he comes he will find a host of eager hands stretched out in glad welcome.

G. W. FOOTE.

After four months' sojourn amongst us, Mr. Putnam sailed on Saturday last for New York, in the steamship Paris. With other friends I saw our friend off from Waterloo Station at 9:40. Mr. Foote, having to start for Glasgow, could not be at the station. At 12:30 I received the following telegram: "On board 'Paris.' Good-bye. Freethought always.—S. P. PUTNAM."

I am sure the readers of the Freethinker will wish our American visitor a safe and pleasant voyage. During his stay with us he has made many friends, who will be glad to give him another welcome to old England. CHARLES WATTS.

Canadian Secularists in Convention.

The annual convention of the Canadian Secular Union was held at Toronto, Saturday and Sunday, Sept. 7th and 8th. Among those present from a distance were: Mr. A. Roe, Wingham; Mr. Wm. McDonnell, Lindsay; Mr. A. Keith, Listowel; Mr. Hollingsworth, Beatrice; Mr. Jickling, Listowel; Mr. Clark and Mr. Horsey, Agincourt; Mr. Helm, Peterboro; Mr. Dale, Brampton, etc. Capt. R. C. Adams, president, being engaged in important business on the Pacific coast, was unable to be present. Mr. Hollingsworth, of Muskoka, occupied the chair, and the president's address was read by the secretary, Mr. J. Spencer Ellis. In the course of the address, President Adams said:

"It behooves Secularists to be especially on the alert at this time, to see that instruction in their principles is made accessible to young Christians. The great need is the circulation of Liberal literature. An able and acceptable paper like Secular Thought should by all means be sustained and its sphere enlarged. Such good work as is done by THE TRUTH SEEKER, with its letter-writing corps and its distribution of Paine's 'Age of Reason,' and 'Bible Contradictions' ought to be emulated in Canada."

Captains Adams declined re-election as president.

The secretary made a brief report detailing the work of the past year. Letters were read from George Martin and John Grant, Montreal; J. A. Rollins, Exeter; Charles Etler, Gravenhurst; B. Marcuse, Danville; Henry J. Bird, Bracebridge; M. O'B. Ward, Peterboro; Walt. A. Ratcliffe, Listowel; David Gardiner, Sunderland; B. C. Gesner, Moncton; Franklin Steiner, Des Moines, Ia.; M. Stead, Halifax, N. S.; Chas. Laperché, Howich; W. R. Bell, Morpeth, and others.

The officers elected for 1895-6 were as follows:

President—Allen Pringle, of Selby, Ont.
Vice-Presidents—1st, W. G. Hay, Listowel, Ont.; 2d, R. T. Holman, Summerside, P. E. I.; 3d, A. Roe, Wingham, Ont.
Secretary—J. S. Ellis, Toronto.
Treasurer—A. Earsman, Toronto.
Executive Committee—Geo. Martin, Montreal; Capt. Robt. C. Adams, Montreal; W. S. Hodgins, Waterloo; W. Algie, Alton, Ont.; John Taylor, Toronto; M. Rattenbury, Charlottetown, P. E. I.; Wm. Keith, Listowel; W. Stewart, Ponsonby, P. Q.; Mrs. Hepburn (nee Sanderson), Toronto.

Among the resolutions passed were these:

Resolved, That this Union is gratified to know that steps are being taken by the American Secular Union and the Freethought Federation of America to close up their ranks for the attainment of their common objects, and sends fraternal greetings and wishes for a successful Congress in October next.

Resolved, That the Executive Committee of the Union be urged to more vigorous efforts to issue propagandist literature, and especially such as to influence the French people of Quebec.

Greetings were sent to Messrs. Watts and Foote and to the other Secularists of England, and a vote of thanks passed to THE TRUTH SEEKER and other Liberal journals of the United States for papers sent to the reading-room of the Toronto Society.

Commenting upon the proceedings, Secular Thought says editorially: "The Convention was not as numerously attended this year as usual, but the enthusiasm shown by the friends in all parts of Canada proves their unabated interest in our cause, and we look forward confidently to a more successful season's work than that of any previous year. Our new president's name, well known as it is all over Canada, will be sufficient guarantee that the interests of Freedom will not be neglected in the future any more than in the past, and we bespeak the hearty co-operation of all Canadian Secularists in any measures he may propose for their advancement."

"It is with a feeling of great regret that we part company with Captain Adams as president. During the five years in which he has filled the office of president he has endeared himself to all our members by his uniform kindness of manner, his promptness in responding to all sorts of appeals, and his untiring energy in the discharge of his duties, often at a great expense of time as well as money. We are gratified to know, however, that he will be shoulder-to-shoulder with us in the work of the future, in which he is still as deeply interested as he was on the day he first joined the Freethought ranks."

THE Manhattan Liberal Club meets every Friday evening in German Masonic Hall, 220 East 15th street, New York, at 8 o'clock. Program for October:

Friday evening, Oct. 4th—"Signs of the Times," Katherine Stag.

Observations.

Although the late Professor Huxley was an Infidel and incurred a rebuke from the Rev. Dr. Wace for not calling himself one, there are religious editors who are willing to risk the fate of the untruthful in order to convey to their readers the notion that he was otherwise. A Catholic magazine gives Professor Tyndall as authority for the statement by Huxley that if there were no one else to instruct his children in the Bible, he would so instruct them himself; and it is implied that he would teach the book to his children as the infallible truth about the matters of which it treats. To expose that swindler it is only necessary to read what Huxley said about the Bible. Under any circumstances there is pleasure and profit in quoting this wise author, but when at the same time the quotation denudes some incorrigible misstater of fact, the pastime becomes a hilarious joy. In October, 1893, Huxley wrote as follows:

The doctrine of Biblical infallibility was widely held by my countrymen within my recollection: I have reason to think that many persons of unimpeachable piety, a few of learning, and even some of intelligence, yet uphold it. But I venture to entertain a doubt whether it can produce any champion whose competency and authority would be recognized beyond the limits of the sect or theological coterie to which he belongs.....The truth is that the pretension to infallibility, by whomsoever made [his holiness the pope will pay attention here], has done endless mischief; with impartial malignity it has proved a curse, alike to those who have made it and those who have accepted it; and its most baneful shape is book infallibility.

The Catholic who accepts the infallibility of the pope, and the Protestant who accepts the infallibility of the Bible, may mingle the bones for what consolation and support is discoverable for them in these words, and the one who gets it will not need an express-wagon to carry home his winnings.

In Huxley's first "Lecture on Evolution" is a passage frequently cited by the religious press to show that this man of science admitted the plausibility of the Genesis story of creation. Here it is:

Though we are quite clear about the constancy of the order of Nature at the present time and in the present state of things, it by no means necessarily follows that we are justified in expanding this generalization into the infinit past, and in denying absolutely that there may have been a time when Nature did not follow a fixed order, when the relations of cause and effect were not definite, and when extra natural agencies interfered with the general course of Nature.

Of course if we allow that "extra-natural agencies interfered with the general course of nature," then the Genesis narrative is as likely as any other to be true; and here the misinterpreter of Huxley ends his quotation and begins his exegesis. He does not reproduce the next sentence, which gives us the supplement, thus:

Cautious men will allow that a universe so different from that which we know may have existed; just as a very candid thinker may admit that a world in which two and two do not make four, and in which two straight lines do inclose a space, may exist.

That is to say, the Genesis story is about as probable as the hypothesis that somewhere two and two are three or three and a half, or that parallel lines meet at both ends. It really looks as if Huxley was poking fun at Moses. But this student of nature knew pretty near where he was at. He never attempted to mix science and superstition, or to beguile others into that sort of error. He said very plainly that those who accepted the conclusions of evolution as to the basis of life placed their foot on the first rung of a ladder which is the reverse of Jacob's, and leads to the antipodes of heaven.

Mr. John C. Sproug, of Chicago, directs my attention to the following bit of gratuitous guessing, which is printed in Self-Culture, a magazine, irreclaimably Catholic:

Had Thomas Paine's mind been clear in his last moments, he would undoubtedly have died in the communion of the Catholic church. If he had lived to our time, and had appeared on the platform of the Parliament of Religions to listen to Cardinal Gibbons's exposition of the supreme place of charity in Christianity, he would beyond a doubt have accepted without qualification such an interpretation of the essentials of religion.

There is no uncertainty about Paine's "last moments." His mind was clear, and he deliberately rejected the offices of the priests. Therefore the supposition that he could have died in the communion of the Catholic or any other church lacks the basis of observed phenomena which all speculation must have in order to prove successful. He disliked popery more than evangelical superstition, because, more than the other, it came between "man and his maker"—an interference which he especially resented.

When we begin theorizing about what the prominent characters of the past would do were they permitted to be contemporary with ourselves, a wide field is opened up. We might say that if Jehovah lived in these days, he would be the corporation deity of the gang of fanatics who are harassing Christian missionaries in China. If some of the popes were living, they would be in the penitentiary. If the Virgin Mary were not fortunately deceased, her character would be impugned by her orthodox neighbors. If Jesus Christ were on earth, Coxey and Keir Hardie would not be in it. The disciples brought up to date would be seining for porgies with Capt. Silas Latham—all but Judas, who would have Comstock's job and do outside work as a Parkhurst "angel." It might be uncomfortable to have all these misfits thrown back upon us at once, but we would manage to distribute them.

Editor Green of the Freethought Magazine has had nothing to say why sentence should not be passed upon Mr. J. B. Wise, of Clay Center, Kan., who sent a passage of scripture through the mails unaccompanied by the context, and was arrested for violating the moral law. I feel justified in alluding to this matter because for the past few months Mr. Green has been generously puffing the Blue Grass Blade, of Lexington, Ky., which during the same period of time has printed every week an advertisement so openly violative of the postal law that the authorities have locked up the editor, C. C. Moore, on a charge similar to that brought against Wise. The September Magazine contains two notices of the Blade as flattering as though Moore had written them himself; yet Mr. Green must have read the matter complained of by the postal authorities, and knew then if he knows now that it is indecent. Life is short and the flight of time all too swift for a fat and indolent man, but I would that it were October so we might learn whether Mr. Green will assume the same attitude in the case of Moore that he does in the case of Wise—that is, whether he will stand by his own opinion or renounce it in favor of the opinion of the parsons who stimulated the prosecution. This is a crisis, and—

Once to every man and nation comes the moment to decide,
In the strife of Truth with Falsehood, for the good or evil side.

If Brother Green does not "feel the soul within him climb" to meet the emergency which confronts him, I venture to hope that he is too far compromised to say so.

The great men who after death are shanghaied into the service of the church are not the only ones to suffer at the hands of religious editors. The Bible is also made to bear false witness. The Advocate says that "Spiritualists should not be allowed the use of orthodox Christian churches for funerals," and "neither should orthodox Christians participate in funeral services with the representatives of Spiritualists." By way of argument the editor then proceeds: "When Paul attempted to console the church in the loss of friends, he had not one word to say about their coming back. So Jesus said: 'I go to prepare a place for you.'" So Jesus said, meaning that his language justified Paul's omission, would amount to a criminal assault on veracity if the truth had any legal rights that religious editors were under obligation to recognize. The next words of Christ after those quoted by the Advocate to prove that return after death is a delusion are these: "I WILL COME AGAIN."

The revival of the curfew in many parts of the country is an indication of the stern-way we are now making toward medievalism. A curfew is a bell rung at candle-lighting. If after the prescribed hour a child under the age of consent is detected in the act of being upon the public street, by or in default of its parents' permission, a fine of one hundred dollars, more or less, is incurred. The custom of course has its origin in the hen-roost, though its present adherents are insensible of that fact. They take a hint from Mohammed, who prayed that the mountain might come to him, but learning that that natural object was sedentary in its habits, he went to the mountain. The clergy, who are the volunteer herders of the populace, seeing that a penitentiary cannot at present be erected in every town without exceeding the legal indebtedness, have started in with the material at hand, and propose to make every child's home its own jail. Parents are honored by appointment as assistant jailers over the fruit of their loins. It is superfluous to inquire—Whither are we drifting? We are hell-bent for Puritanism.

It is true, as the New York Sun rises to remark, that things are mixed in Lafayette Place. There is some sort of Catholic juvenile institution down at the lower end, with a statue of Father Drumgoole, "the newsboys' friend," who befriended these and other urchins by making Catholics out of them. (I suspect the little rascals know what has become of my boy's hook-and-ladder truck with horses attached that galloped when the wheels went round.) Also a Socialist paper which enjoys sustenance drawn from a fund left by old Dr. Habel for purposes similar to those of the Legitimation League of England. Not counting the Astor library, the Mercantile library, the Churchman office, and the contiguous Germania theater, right alongside this magazine of heresy is the distilled small Voice, pious and Prohibition; while straight over the way is the Episcopal see house, occupied by Bishop Potter. The bishop is a good enough neighbor, though not socially inclined in this direction. Neither he nor Mrs. Potter has ever called. From reports I learn that he is a gentleman and a scholar who knows a little of everything, even theology, and he belongs to a church that has the reputation of never interfering with its members' politics or religion. Barring a graveyard with a four-story mausoleum in it, I know of nothing to compare in point of cheerfulness with Bishop Potter's see house. In this establishment we have grown to look upon the structure with unruffled equanimity; but when Park & Tilford's grocery wagon drives up to its door and the driver proceeds to unload boxes of the Milwaukee brew, or baskets of hochheimer, or cases of red-eye above proof, it is stated that Dr. Funk of the Voice experiences a dryness of the throat which impedes respiration, and he regrets being a Prohibitionist instead of an Episcopalian.

I believe I am guilty of no unpardonable enthusiasm when I say that could the lamented Lafayette revisit the glimpses of the thoroughfare named after him, he would be interested.

GEO. E. MACDONALD.

Our Missionary Work.

Several of our good friends have written us that in their opinion the work, "Self Contradictions of the Bible," should go along with Paine's "Age of Reason" as a missionary pamphlet. Mr. J. R. Perry puts it thus: "As a missionary document the 144 Self Contradictions will go hand in hand with the 'Age of Reason.' I think any person getting the one will get the other. It is the grubbing process, clearing out the roots and stones, necessary to preparing the soil for good seeds of common sense." And as it is our delight to furnish the implements for this sort of agricultural operations, we are willing to do our part and will send the "Self-Contradictions of the Bible" to those who will distribute it among their Christian friends, FOR A DOLLAR A DOZEN. Or we will send twelve copies to as many different addresses for one dollar.

Now let the friends of Freethought turn to and circulate "Self Contradictions" as well as the "Age of Reason." Send both books out by the thousand and watch the result. Flood the country with them, and let the Christians know what their holy paper fetich, the Bible, is like and why it is worthless as a guide to any good.

THE TRUTH SEEKER's offer to send eight copies of Paine's "Age of Reason" to eight different addresses for $1, to be used for missionary purposes, is still open. The best results are reported from this method of reaching intelligent believers and giving a new direction to their thoughts.

Letters of Friends.

The Lamp Still Burns.

WHAT CHEER, I.A., Sept. 11, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: You will find inclosed $3, for which please send me THE TRUTH SEEKER one year and Watson Heston's "Pictorial Text-Book."

Respectfully, CHAS. MACAULAY.

BANGOR, MICH., Sept. 7, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Seeing your very liberal offer to new subscribers, and wishing to take advantage of it, I inclose $3, for which send to my address THE TRUTH SEEKER one year and a copy of the "Free thinker's Pictorial Text-Book."

HENRY HOSNER.

A Perennial Fount.

SEATTLE, WASH., Sept. 6, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: THE TRUTH SEEKER is our hope and joy. We would feel utterly lost if it did not appear every week.

Yours, JOHN ODIN.

Seed-Sowing in Maine.

HALLOWELL, MAINE, Sept. 15, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose a renewal of my subscription to your very interesting paper. I broadcast every number among people of brain and thought, and trust they may enlighten and purify many.

EMELINE A. PRESCOTT.

"The Truth Seeker" at a Parity.

LASEA, TENN., Sept. 13, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find the amount for which I am indebted to you for the only paper worth its weight in gold. THE TRUTH SEEKER is read by few in this state, owing to ignorance and superstition—in other words, the fear of hell.

Yours to a finish, J. C. SPEER.

Against Mockery at Funerals.

NIPOMO, CAL., Sept. 2, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed twenty-five cents for the "Secular Marriage and Funeral Ritual and Collection of Secular Hymns." It seems to me that the mockery of religious ceremony at the grave of the great Huxley should be a warning to all Freethinkers not only to be prepared to conduct secular funerals if necessary, but to prepare a written statement of their wishes in regard to their own funerals, and give it into the keeping of some trustworthy person. The members of our society, at least, are aroused to action in the matter.

Death of an Old Friend.

NEW YORK, Sept. 11, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Hiram Anderson, one of your oldest subscribers, died of blood poisoning on Sept. 2, 1895, at the age of sixty-eight. His death was a blow to his many friends, and being one of these I send this word. No other member of the family would notify you, as they are all of the orthodox Christian class who would hold no communication with Freethinkers. You will not discontinue Mr. Anderson's paper, as I receive and read it myself, and have been doing so for a long time. When his subscription expires I will renew it.

I have found a place for your paper in the reading-room of the New York Turn Verein, Bloomingdale, to which I belong, and think it will do a great deal of good among the members of our society.

Yours truly, HARRY SCHEER.

No Moss for Him.

FARMINGTON, CAL., Sept. 10, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Please send me the tracts and pamphlets named in accompanying list.

I am going to get the moss off of my back in religion as well as politics, even if it is not the same as my pa did. I think if the great mass of the people should do likewise and throw their prejudice to the winds, we should not long see, as now, 30,000 people (according to the late census reports) owning one-half of the entire wealth of this nation, and the highways filled with tramps. Every millionaire means so many thousand tramps, for all wealth, whether created by interest, rent, gambling, or other scheming methods, is the product of labor. The poor man in his prejudice marches up to the polls and votes the same ticket as Pullman, Carnegie, Gould, Vanderbilt, and Rockefeller, and then wonders why he does not receive any benefit therefrom. The two dominant parties have never threatened the gigantic monopolies with government ownership and control of railroads and telegraphs, to be run on the same plan as the post-office, which enables the publishing houses to send our daily and weekly papers at the rate of a cent a pound, while a private company would not be likely to look at them for less than five cents; and still the people of this country, on account of their prejudice, would die, almost, before they would consent to any alteration of their religion or business interests. O prejudice, thou art the devil.

Kissing the Hand that Smites.

DALLAS, TEX., Sept. 12, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed I send you a poem which is meant to express something of the spirit of Christian tyranny. As you see, I sent it to the American Sentinel, which I mistook for a Liberal paper. I suppose I ought to have sent it to you at first, but then it would not so clearly have shown how the tyranny of Christian environment can warp and bind otherwise good-minded men. From this letter of rejection I infer that the Sentinel editor is a good man, bound hand and foot by the dogmas of Christianity. General Free-thought and individual independence are yet to be accomplished.

Fraternally yours, B. C. TABER, M.D.

[Following is the letter from the editor of the American Sentinel, to which Dr. Taber refers.]

NEW YORK, Sept. 1, 1895.

B. C. TABER, M.D., Dallas, Tex.: Dear Sir: Your esteemed favor of the 26th ult. has been received and read with interest, as also the poem, "The Tennessee Boy's Soliloquy." We appreciate very highly your commendation of the Sentinel, as also your kindness in favoring us with a contribution. We do not see our way clear, however, to publish this "Soliloquy," because, as you yourself suggest, we think it a little "too radical." It contains a number of expressions which would probably be offensive to many people, and withal place the Tennessee boy, who is supposed to be soliloquizing, in the attitude of criticising Christianity in general; whereas, we do not think that true Christianity is at fault. The Sentinel is a Christian paper, and we cannot publish anything that would reflect upon Christianity. Very respectfully yours,

"AMERICAN SENTINEL," per C. P. B.

Now for the poem:

THE TENNESSEE BOY'S SOLILOQUY.

An outrage has been committed,
They say, in old Foo Chow—
Some Christian missions been outwitted
In a heathen Chinese row.

They used them up the same old way
They used to one another;
But now, 'tis heathen dogs, they say,
Then, 'twas the Christian brother.

But, mother, what is all this fuss
About the heathen dogs,
When they have taken father off
For cutting up some logs,

For you to cook our dinner
When we went to making hay
On what some old church sinner
Calls his holy Sabbath day?

I don't see what the difference is Between the heathen dog
And the conscientious Christians
That are meaner than a hog.

It seems to me they better let
The heathen dogs alone,
And start a little mission school
Of common sense at home.

With father in the chain-gang
To settle the church rules,
We boys will keep on thinking,
That the Christians all are fools.

When I grow up I'll fight such stuff
With all that I can gain,
And make the Christian brotherhood
Just rise up and explain.

Mr. Steiner Makes a Hi!, as Usual.

OMAHA, NEB., Sept. 10, A.M. 1895.

MR. EDITOR: On Sunday afternoon, September 1st, the Omaha Philosophical Society introduced itself to the public in an appropriate manner. The feature of the occasion was a lecture by that popular young Freethinker, Franklin Steiner, the subject being "Morality Without Superstition;" and notwithstanding the fact that the universal dullness of the times made it impossible to raise sufficient money to advertise the lecture as it should have been, nevertheless when the time arrived the speaker found himself confronted by an audience of about three hundred, quite a number of whom were ladies. Among the audience were several from Council Bluffs, headed by such sturdy pioneers in the cause as Mr. Blinn and Mr. Burgess. The intelligence, decorum, and general bearing of the audience was far above the average of people who attend lectures. There were many Liberal Christians present who, be it said to their credit, behaved better than their more orthodox brethren sometimes do at lectures of this kind. Our president, Mr. J. W. Logan, in a few well-chosen remarks, introduced Mr. Steiner, who, in a masterly manner, delivered such an address as our people here seldom have the good fortune to listen to.

Mr. Steiner wasted no time in flights of imagination, but confined himself throughout to the most stubborn facts. He attacked no individuals, but creeds and superstition received the merciless blows of truth. Mr. Steiner must have confined himself strictly to truth, as no "sky-pilot," or anyone else present, attempted to question anything he said. From the beginning to the end he received hearty applause. Had the lecture been advertised in the papers, and held at night instead of in the afternoon, the hall, as Mr. Steiner said, would not furnish standing room.

Several Freethinkers, who never even visited our society before, were on hand, and after the lecture was over paid their admission fee and joined us. This alone shows what a lecture, once in awhile, will do. During the evening several gentlemen and ladies of our society paid the popular young orator a friendly call, when the time was passed in social chat and mutual exchanges of friendship. Mr. Steiner will always receive a warm welcome to Omaha.

Bible Stories.

MR. EDITOR: A recent correspondent of THE TRUTH SEEKER, writing of the fall of the walls of Jericho by the sound of rams' horns, asks if anyone is fool enough to believe the biblical account.

This seemingly miraculous story may be easily explained by a little study and common sense.

It is quite evident that the only way the attacking party saw to take the city was by undermining its strong walls; and it was wise strategy to make pretense of the miraculous in so doing in order that the event might be credited to their god. To prevent the miners and sappers from being heard and discovered at their work, the circuit of priests and tooting of rams' horns was made daily, and on the seventh day, being then ready to cave in the wall at different points, the racket of the horns and loud shouts of the multitude were kept up until the wall tumbled in, after which the city was soon destroyed. This no doubt was the way of it, if any credence is to be given the legendary tale.

So also may other stories of the same sort be explained away by those whose minds are not so blinded that they cannot reason on anything related in the Bible, no matter how absurd or improbable.

The story of Elijah's test by fire with the prophets of Baal is one that can be seen through very readily when one brings the probable facts before his mind as he would try to solve any sleight-of-hand performance, and the wonder is that these priests did not detect the trick. But Elijah waited until the going down of the sun, when the poor priests of Baal were exhausted and smarting from the wounds they had given themselves while praying all day, "O Baal, hear us," and tormented by Elijah telling them to "pray louder," they were not in a condition to take much notice of his work digging a trench and having water poured into it, or to observe when he poured petroleum or naphtha on the water and secretly set it on fire, as it was getting dark when he called them to come near and see the fire which blazed upon the water and ran over the stones covered with the fluid. But their giving up and shouting in favor of the Israelitish god, did not save them, for four thousand of them were taken out to the brow of a hill and slaughtered and their bodies thrown over the precipice.

This horrible intrigue and murder wrought by the hand of this saintly prophet, I once heard extolled by a preacher in a sermon with this subject as a text, but, child as I was, I could see only the cruelty of the murderous work, which one of Heston's pictures so vividly portrays.

How easy it is to see in the exodus, how the pillow of fire by night and the cloud of smoke by day was made to be a divine guide, when to camp or when to go forward through the wilderness. This delusion was kept up by prohibiting, on pain of death, anyone from coming near the ark except the priests who bore it and kept up the blaze by night and the smoke by day. This device would have been of use to large trains when crossing the plains, as many would differ as to time or place of camping or how long to remain.

Many of the Bible stories are explained in "Types of Mankind." That of Samson and his foxes is given as a wrong translation of the Hebrew words, foxes meaning shocks of grain turned or tied end to end, instead of tail to tail, a very natural way of setting the fields of the Philistines on fire before a single fox could have been caught, and these would have run for the woods instead of the grain fields.

So also the narrative of Elijah being fed by ravens. The word "raven" in Hebrew has the same meaning and nearly the same form or character as the word "robber," or "robbers," which meant the wandering Arabs or Bedouins of the desert. As these passed the brook Kedron, and saw the old prophet sitting there with nothing to eat, they gave him of their fare of bread and meat, which would be a very unnatural thing for ravens to do.

I might show up many other incredible things which are believed by those who will not or dare not throw the flash-light of reason on anything that is in the book they call holy, but send men to prison for transmitting its divinely written passages through the mails. It needs another Paine to clear this rubbish from the path of progress.

L. HUTCHINSON.

As to Competition and Speculation.

CLACKAMAS, OR., Sept. 9, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Do we not boast of being reformers? Then where is our reform in the matter of financial justice? It is claimed by some that governments can do nothing but conform to the usages and customs of the people, just as though they had no power to lay the hand of justice on extortions and oppressions.

The history of the world up to to-day shows that the laws are so shaped that the rich may oppress the poor, and might may rule over right. As a consequence, money flows into the coffers of the few, to the detriment of the many. Hence a cry of distress arises from every people in the civilized world.

This condition of affairs will not last much longer. When we hear volcanic rumblings beneath the earth's surface, we know an eruption is threatened, and unless the forces underneath find relief, the consequences are destructive. Statesmen should beware how they act in this matter, and look immediately to the welfare of the people, and not alone to the interests of the few.

But where is the remedy for these evils? Philosophers tell us that to find a remedy, we must first find a cause; and I give it as my opinion, deduced from long and careful observation, that speculation is the main cause of the financial distress of the world. I cannot find that there ever was a money panic that was not caused by speculation. And yet speculation and competition, twin thieves, are not only allowed to exist, but are encouraged by law as legitimate levers of business.

Speculation is to get property into our possession without rendering an equivalent; and the principle is just as wrong to the amount of five cents, as it is to the amount of millions; while competition is a race between the swift and the slow, the stronger and the weaker, and invariably results in favor of might over right.

The claim that to rule speculation and competition out of use would be detrimental to the prosperity of the country, is a false claim. It is true, it would be injurious to that mode of making a living, but the sooner that result comes around, the better for all concerned. For then strict and merited justice would step in as the rule of support, and men would only get what they earned, and would get all they earned. Nothing less, nothing more.

I am fully persuaded that if speculation and competition were condemned as criminal acts, and made punishable by law, there are many men who would not know how to make the first turn for their own support. They have lived so long in the sweat of others' faces that it would go hard with them to make the needed and just change. But let such suffer the consequences until they are relieved by repentance. Far better that suffering should fall on the man of idleness than on the man of toil. Speculation is now rampant in most every part of our country, but more so at Washington city, perhaps, than anywhere else. Our laws are so shaped that through the bond and banking system of finances, a few men control the country's currency, and these men do not use scrupulous care to deal justly with the people's money. They are allowed to speculate in every conceivable way, and they haste to use this liberty to our detriment.

Speculation and competition in all things commercial should cease at once, and all good men in every nation should lend their efforts in that direction. Nor should they forget the prohibition of the sale and use of useless and vitiating articles of trade. There are many things sold over our counters to-day of no material benefit to anyone. In such cases the buyer injures himself and family financially, a thing he has no moral right to do, while the seller aids and abets this injury and takes that in exchange for which he renders an unequal equivalent.

If we ever expect universal justice to rule supreme among us, why not begin now the real work to bring it about, and cease conniving at the frauds of custom, which work injury continuously? The millennium will never come to us until we, by our efforts, prepare the way for it.

Freethought in Texas—That Prayer Test.

DALLAS, TEX., Sept. 12, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: The Freethinkers of Texas are moving ahead and keeping things stirred up along the orthodox lines. Our society in this city is doing some very good work, and occasionally a reporter drops in and gives us a write-up. The papers here are treating us kindly, considering the fact that orthodoxy still hangs like a fog bank over the Lone Star state. The Dallas News and the Times-Herald have both given us space, and they always insert notices of our meetings. We are growing right along and will soon be recognized as a power in this community. We stand squarely on the Secular platform, and demand equal rights to all. Our secretary, Mr. O. Paget, deserves the praise of all Freethinkers for the way he nails lies. [Mr. Paget investigated the Georgia "fake" exposed in these columns September 14th, and the result was published in the Times-Herald of Dallas.]

Our prayer test, with Mrs. Sweeney and God on one side and Mr. O. Paget and Mr. J. R. Charlesworth on the other, has turned out just as the Rev. Dr. Buckley predicted. Who dares say we have no inspired prophets in these days? Here is the report of the meeting from the Dallas News:

The Freethinkers had their prayer test last night, the nature of which is explained by the following remarks of Mr. O. Paget: "On the 4th day of June, 1895, we assembled in this hall to hear a lecture, the third of the series by Mr. John R. Charlesworth.

"The lecture was entitled, 'Is There a God?' and the speaker claimed that while there might be one, there was no actual evidence to prove it. He went over the ground from the earliest historic records to the present day, and claimed that in the economy of nature there was no necessity for a God. At the conclusion of the lecture Mrs. Sweeney, evangelist of the Dallas Women's Christian Temperance Union, arose and asked the lecturer if he would give her his name, and that she would pray for him, and if he felt his heart touched he was to make as public an admission of the fact as he had of his unbelief in a deity. The secretary of the Freethinkers' society then arose and asked the lady if she would kindly accept his name; that he, like the lecturer, doubted the existence of Jehovah—all he stipulated for was a time limit—that he did not want to wait till he was dead, as they might say he made a death-bed recantation. The time limit was set at three months. He further stipulated that, if at the end of the three months he and Mr. Charlesworth, or either of them, had not made a public confession, the lady was to admit that there was no efficacy in prayer, that God was a failure and did not exist. To this the lady agreed, and the lecturer and secretary signed this very extraordinary challenge. Mrs. Sweeney denies the stipulation, and on that there is a question of veracity. The time was up at 8 o'clock last Tuesday evening, and I will say I am not touched, not materially."

Mr. Charlesworth gave in his testimony and it was that he had not undergone any change of heart.

Mr. Paget read the following correspondence:

"DALLAS, TEX., Sept. 5, 1895.

"MRS. S. J. SWEENEY, City, Dear Madam: The time limit to your three months of prayer for the conversion of Mr. Charlesworth and Mr. Paget expired (if my memory serves me right) last night. As there were conditions on both sides to be filled I should be pleased to have you attend our Sunday night meeting. Mr. Paget and Mr. Charlesworth will do their part, and we shall expect you to do yours. Assuring you of my love for truth, and expressing the desire that men become moral and good, I remain sincerely,

"G. S. LINCOLN,

"President Freethinkers."

"OFFICE OF EVANGELISTIC SUPERINTENDENT, DALLAS, TEX., Sept. 6, 1895.

"DR. G. S. LINCOLN, Dear Sir: Your favor of the 5th at hand. I was quite surprised, but will answer you briefly. You misquoted me in public print, and when I corrected the mistake in the next issue you voted my correction false. That ended the matter as far as I am concerned. I cannot consent to place myself and the God I love where I cannot expect to receive anything but ridicule. I shall be pleased and I think able to answer any argument you make in a public meeting I am arranging, or through your favorite paper, the Times-Herald. I realize Mr. Charlesworth is a great power for good as evil. I have and will still continue to ask God to change his heart that his wonderful magnetic influence may be exerted for good. Please tell him for me that until the ink fades from the paper, or until my life closes, I will remember him each day at the throne of grace he scorns. My morning lesson reads: Jer. xiv, 10, 11, 12.

"Respectfully, S. J. SWEENEY."

"DALLAS, TEX., Sept. 6, 1895.

"MRS. S. J. SWEENEY, City, Dear Madam: You may have been so excited that you did not fully understand the conditions of the test, but over two hundred people will testify that our own version was the correct one. We made a mistake in not putting it into writing at the time and have all the interested parties sign it. To err is human, and I feel that you ought to come up and say that there was a misunderstanding. You will be accorded a hearing at least and no church would allow us that much. Our platform is open to you or anyone else, and while we may perhaps ridicule you, we will allow you to do the same with us. You may talk on prohibition or anything you please, and I will see that you receive just treatment. Come, let us reason together. We will review your lecture of course. We seek the truth. If you have it bring some of it to us. Your letter will be read before the society. Please let me know about this public meeting of yours and whether you will allow a word from the 'other side.' Assuring you of my respect for you personally, I remain most sincerely,

"G. S. LINCOLN,

"President Freethinkers."

Mr. Paget read Mrs. Sweeney's scriptural lesson, the last verse being, "When they fast I will not hear them cry; when they offer burnt offering and an oblation I will not accept them; but I will consume them by the sword and by the flame and by the pestilence."

Mr. Paget said that this was rather an uncharitable way of dealing with seekers after truth, but he felt he could survive the prayer. The Women's Christian Temperance Union, he said, gathered from Dallas, Waco, and other points to Fort Worth, to pray for prohibition, and again their prayers were not heard. "Did you," he said, "ever hear of a cyclone wrecking a dancehouse, and did you ever hear of one striking a town that it did not knock the steeple off some joshouse? Why, if there was a personal God, don't you know that he would destroy the first ward of this city?"

The speaker concluded by reading a number of letters from people at a distance, who said that they were watching Mrs. Sweeney's prayer test with interest.

He was followed by Mr. Charlesworth, who spoke at considerable length in the same strain. There were about two hundred persons present.

You can see by these notes that the Freethinkers' Association of Dallas, Tex., is alive, and that it is making things interesting for the orthodox.

Yours truly, G. S. LINCOLN, M.D.

Spiritualism Once More.

LOS ANGELES, CAL., Sept. 10, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: Hope is an indispensable factor in human happiness, and yet we all know that hope is utterly destitute of reliability. Ingersoll terms it an inveterate liar. Aristotle called it a waking dream. Nevertheless what people desire they hope for, and what they hope for they expect to get. The hope of immortality is not of recent birth in the mind of man, but the manifestations afforded by Spiritualism are the only evidence to sustain that hope which has yet been given to an anxious world. Are these spiritualistic manifestations sufficient and satisfactory? To some they are, to others they are not, and the world is divided in opinion where honest and sincere investigators have seen the same in all their phases. Intelligent people not blinded by church creeds, if they have given evolution any study, now accept that theory in accounting for the presence of man on the earth. The evolutionary theory takes us back to a time when, the earth being in an incandescent state, no form of sentient life did or could exist. With changes which came through the lapse of inconceivable periods of time the earth was fitted for low orders of living entities, and they appeared spontaneously, improving in species and increasing in variety, until we see the present culmination of life and intelligence in mortal man. That he was always a physical being in some form must be admitted, but whether he is a physical and a spiritual being combined is something we do not yet know; and if he really is, we are confronted with the conundrum, How long has he been such, and at what stage in his evolutionary unfoldment did he acquire a dual nature, the spiritual part of which is immortal and indestructible as a conscious entity? Immortality is denied by Spiritualists to every form of conscious life except man; and yet evolution tells us there was a time when undeveloped man existed in a state not attended by immortality any more than the ape or gorilla, which forms of life and consciousness perish with the body.

Such being the case, we must suppose the soul of man to have had a mysterious birth at some time during his unfoldment into a higher type of animal; and when the reasonable possibility of such a thing is considered it increases the doubt that he has such a thing as an immortal soul.

We must never lose sight of the fact that mortal man is an animal, though incased in broadcloth and under a plug hat, and as the same characteristics are seen in all animals there is nothing in man's nature to reveal his superiority in the animal kingdom except his improved physical form and more highly developed reasoning faculties. He propagates his species like other animals, requires food and digests it like them, and must also have his periods of rest and sleep. He is born like an animal, and dies like one; and who really knows, in these days, any more about his preeminence over the beast in death than Solomon knew? So great, however, is man's self-conceit that he says: "I alone, of all living creatures, possess an immortal soul destined to remain forever conscious." A little more modesty might lead him to change his opinion, for nothing in this world is plainer than the fact that nature has no more regard for a man than she has for a mouse, both being exterminated with equal indifference when they get in the way of natural forces. It was Margaret Fuller who said that Nature never did betray the heart that loved her; and yet one of nature's ocean storms wrecked the ship Margaret Fuller sailed in, and drowned her with the same unconcern it did the rats that thus perished. Possibly they found annihilation and she regained lost consciousness in another world, but who knows? While nature thus destroys human life there is little reason to suppose it is preserved and perpetuated in an invisible form and world after the death of this body; but as Bolingbroke said, man having once tasted of life, dislikes the thought of giving it up, so hope comes in and proclaims another. But Spiritualism, as before stated, presents the only evidence ever encountered. If we have a spirit form or body that survives the physical one, it must be composed of something, as Mr. Swan admits. Still, I know of but one Spiritualist lecturer and author who ever told in plain words what a spirit is. "A human spirit," said he, "is but a quantity of nitrogen gas, possessing a current of the Almighty, called by scientists electricity." Here we have the secret of the ages, and the mystery of life and death stands revealed; for he further says: "Only a current of electricity coursing in the gaseous copy of a human body provides it with life and the power of motion. This strange power was operating the body when the spirit was in it, and it was but a continuation of the power in the spirit when a gross body was cleaved from a finer one." This explanation is probably as good as any, and the person who believes that man has an immortal spirit endowed with endless consciousness may as well believe it is nitrogen gas with a streak of electricity as something else, for how the fact can be proven, so that knowledge may supersede belief, is not made known.

While Spiritualism is flooding us with communications, and mediums are paid in money for their services, it would seem, from a practical point of view, that no reasonable offer should be refused. Yet when Horace Greeley was living he once offered a handsomely salaried engagement to a medium if the daily London Mark Lane reports could be given him for publication in the Tribune, the same to be verified by mail before payment. The offer was not accepted, and I have known of others that were declined when a good sum of money was promised for information that "spirits," if there were any, had the power to give. While mediums will tell your fortune for $2, and charge from $1 to $5 for a private seance, they consider a practical offer like Greeley's "making merchandise" of the spirit world; but as the sinful difference between such an offer and the tender of payment for fortune-telling is not so great as to be readily detected, their inability to perform any part in getting the desired reports may have been the real cause for refusal. As everybody knows, mediums and clairvoyants diagnose disease where you tell them pretty near what ails you by giving several leading symptoms, and most Spiritualists think a medium can learn all about your internal arrangements, though a thousand miles away, from a lock of hair; but how their faith will stand the recent disclosure made by a noted and prominent lecturer on Spiritualism, I cannot tell. He had had no end of mediums trying to discover, for fourteen years, what ailed him; but none of them was successful. Finally some materialistic doctor mistrusted a tape worm, and the proper medicine removed one of those sustainers of the "design argument" eighty feet long. Where, oh, where, were the spirits that hover round us for fourteen long years, and what ailed all the clairvoyants, any one of whom can see through a brick wall, if they tell the truth?

Mr. Swan, did I hear you speak?

By the census of 1890, the above is the value of

Church Property

in the United States.

Should It Be Exempt from Taxation?

REASONS WHY IT SHOULD NOT.

Our pamphlet with this title contains an Argument for Equality of Taxation, and a Statement of Facts, giving, from the Census of 1890, the Value, by Denominations, of Church Property in the United States and in the several States and Territories and in all Cities having 25,000 or more inhabitants; so arranged as to show at a glance the relative standing as to Wealth of the Leading Denominations and Denominational Groups. Also, much other matter of especial interest to certain Cities, States, and Sections, all comparisons being based upon official figures. This pamphlet is the only one of the kind published. In no other work are the facts, figures, and arguments to be found. The figures being derived from the Government Census of 1890, will not be superseded until the census of 1900 shall have been completed—probably about eight years hence. The arguments are unanswerable and will have the dew of morning on them so long as the injustice of church exemption is suffered to exist.

By single copies the price is 15 cents, but as the work is published specially for distribution by those who favor justice in taxation the following reductions are made:

Ten copies, $1.00
Fifty copies, 4.50
One hundred copies, 8.00

Larger quantities at special rates.

That he could tell him how to pick so he'd come out ahead.
"First find your bush," said Johnny's pa, "and then stick to it till You've picked it clean. Let those go chasing all about who will
In search of better bushes, but it's picking tells,
my son.
To look at fifty bushes doesn't count like picking one."

And Johnny did as he was told, and sure enough he found
By sticking to his bush while all the others chased around
In search of better picking 'twas as his father said.
For while the others looked he worked, and so came out ahead.
And Johnny recollected this when he became a man,
And first of all he laid him out a well determined plan.
So while the brilliant triflers failed with all their brains and push,
Wise, steady-going Johnny won by "sticking to his bush."

"Hav'n't seen no wite robes, nor crowns, nor gold harps. Nobody seen 'em. Dere's some folks been heah ever sen' Cupid was a puppy, an' he old dog now, an' dey hain't seen 'em. Why, chile; dere's folks, po' white trash, dey be, goes sneakin' roun' a-tryin' to fine de gold sidewalks, so's to rip 'em up an' sell 'em. But dere ain't no gold sidewalks. If dere was, de sun would make 'em so hot ye couldn't walk on 'em, an' dey'd dazzle de eyes right outen ye."

"No, dere ain't no gold harps here, shuah," continues Joseph. "Dere's de fiddles, an' de cornets, an' de organs, an' de Salvationers, dey's got de triangles an' de tamerines."

"Well, where is the Great White Throne, Joseph?"

"Miss Susan, I've been a-lookin' for it eber sen' I've been heah, an' I can't fine it nowhars. De deakens and ministars, dey can't fine it. Dis is de place whar de th'one orter be, but it done seem to be heah."

Joseph then bends toward me and whispers confidentially, "Dey do say, Miss Susan, dat Kunnel Ing'soll, he done gone an' tore de thene all down. I dunno if it be so, but dat what deys all a-sayin'."

As we pass along through the Plaisance all sorts of hideous sights and sounds greeted us, mingled with the comical and clownish. Heads bobbed over the walls of various denominational pens, some of whom I remember to hav seen before.
Some evidently recollect me, for they say among themselves, "How came she here?
I wonder how she got in," etc.

I am glad as we emerge from the din and confusion of the Babel, of which, I wish there were time to giv a full description, and come out into the open country, so to speak, the residential part of the city not made by hands, eternal in the heavens. The grounds present a lovely appearance, roses, lilies, and waving palms, in all the gardens. I am reminded of a California climate and a California landscape. The co-operativ plan prevails and harmony is everywhere. I perceive a higher type of countenance than I beheld in the Plaisance. The noises of the Plais-ance are no longer heard, but I catch the notes of singing birds; and the tinkling gush of fountains and flowing waters amid transcendent groves and purpling mountain shadows breathe Nature's charming melodies.

Here are the abodes of the free and liberally inclined. I meet all the Secular pilgrims who journeyed with me on the earth. I see also Giordano Bruno, Servetus, and many others, who were persecuted unto death for opinion's sake. I see those who were ostracized, abused, tortured by the Christian church, who were slowly burned at the stake, or starved in dungeons, because they believed they had a right to think new thoughts and proclaim new truths. Now they are teachers of still newer truths, and the wise flock to hear them.

I am escorted to one of the beautiful white mansions over whose portal is written "Home," and once more the members of our family are together. The meeting is sweet and sacred.

Upon a neighboring hillside, I perceive a great number of lovely children dressed in white, and with wreaths of roses on their heads. They run to meet me. They carry banners and waving flags. Little hands clasp my neck, and little faces are pressed to mine. I cannot see beyond them, they are so many, and there is no need for anyone to say, "This is the Children's Corner." While I feel the throbbing hearts close pressed to mine, amid the joy of the hour, a voice says,
"Into your hands are committed these children. Teach and train them in the way they should go, the way of truth, and when they are old they will not depart from it." Thus shall I find myself in heaven with my chosen work before me.

S. H. W.

[Of course, the above is simply a fancy sketch of a visit to heaven. There is really no evidence, such as is accepted in courts, by testimony and proofs, human and otherwise, that there is any such abode outside the visible. Heaven in its most reasonable form would seem to be, not a place but a condition, as is also its opposite, and is the contingent of right dealing, good conduct, right living. If human consciousness continues beyond the grave, he who has done the best he could on earth need have no fear.

Who does the best his circumstance allows,
Does well; acts nobly; angels can no
more.

It is my belief that people do about as they are obliged to do, taking into account the circumstances of birth, training, heredity, education, environment, example of others, etc. Many would, without doubt, do much better, if they only knew how.

Speaking for myself, individually, the future has no terrors for me—none whatever. I cannot change, or alter, one law of nature, and would not if I could.
Should the intelligence that animates this brain of mine survive the mold and decay of dissolution, doubtless it will find somewhere its own place and its own work.
If this little span of life, on the contrary, is rounded by a sleep that knows no waking, which seems highly probable, it is in the wise ordering of nature, and there is no complaint to make. Nothing harms or alarms unconsciousness. We shall become as the particles of being were before birth, and in any case, all is well. We should return to the bosom of Mother Earth with all the happy confidence and trust of childhood. When we know that we have done the work that came to our hands to do, to the best of our ability, there can be nothing to fear, nothing to make afraid.

For modes of faith let graceless zealots fight,
His can't be wrong whose life is in the right.

In faith and hope the world will disagree,
But all mankind's concern is charity.

Correspondence.

PATCH GROVE, WIS., Aug. 11, 1895.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I am fourteen years old, and am the next to the youngest of a family of four. The rest are all boys—Harry, George, and Arthur. Harry is nineteen, George sixteen, and Arthur eleven. Our father and mother are both dead. George, Arthur, and I live with our aunt near the town of Bloomington, and go to the Bloomington school, which is considered the second best in Grant county, and Grant county is quite noted for good schools. I have been in the High school one year. I can graduate from it in three years by taking the regular course, but, by studying a little harder, I can finish in two. I think I will do that, and then I want to go to a normal or to the University of Wisconsin.

My grandmother has taken THE TRUTH
SEEKER ever since Mr. Bennett first started it in Illinois, and she intends to take it until she dies. She was sixty-four years old last February. Two of her children got up a surprise-party for her, and those who attended clubbed together and got her "Four Hundred Years of Freethought" and "Woman, Church, and State." There was only one who did not want to get her those. My father also took THE TRUTH SEEKER before he died. I have followed in their footsteps and am a Freethinker, too, and I expect I will sometime take THE TRUTH SEEKER myself.

I believe I could write all afternoon to you, but, as this is my first letter, and rather long already, I think I had better close.

Your affectionate Freethinker friend,
MAY HUMPHREY.

[Such nicely written letters as the above show good training and solid foundations.
When you hav time to do so, May, ask dear grandma to let you read the two splendid books referred to in your letter.
Giv grandma our love and best wishes.
Her example is to be commended. Good reading shows the bent and quality of the mind.—Ed. C. C.]

What the Little Folks Are Saying.

A little boy had a colt and a dog, of both of which he was exceedingly fond.
His generosity was often tried by visitors asking him, just to hear what he would say, to giv them one or both of his pets.

On one occasion Johnny told a gentleman, who had often teased him in this way, that he might hav the colt, but not the dog.

His mother naturally expressed surprise and asked:

"Why, Johnny, why didn't you giv him the dog instead of the colt?"

"Don't say anything, mamma," he whispered; "when he goes to get the colt I'll set the dog on him."—Youth's Companion.

"Father," asked Tommy, the other day,
"why is it that the boy is said to be the father of the man?"

Mr. Tompkins had never given this subject any thought, and was hardly prepared to answer off-hand.

"Why," he said, stumbly, "it's so because it is, I suppose."

"Well, pop, since I'm your father, I'm going to giv you a ticket to the theater and half a dollar besides. I always said that if I was a father I wouldn't be so stingy as the rest of them are. Go in, pop, and hav a good time while you're young. I never had any chance myself."

Mr. Tompkins gazed in blank astonishment at Tommy. Slowly the significance of the hint dawned upon him. Producing a silver dollar, he said:

"Take it, Thomas. When you really do become a father, I hope it won't be your misfortune to hav a son who is smarter than yourself."—Chicago Mail.

Swiss Boys.

Switzerland, strange to say, celebrates the anniversary of its independence only every 100 years, and the sixth anniversary took place not long since. One would almost imagin that the Swiss youth would almost forget his country if this national fete, coming at such long intervals, was the only festival. But it is not. Switzerland is the land of heroism, and so many and various are the historical events that each village and town has numerous celebrations and military displays. The boys on these occasions turn out with all kinds of instruments, musical and unmusical—
Alpine horns, drums, cattle bells, whips, tin kettles—and pass through the streets making as much noise as possible. The costumes in Switzerland are numerous and picturesque. Among Alpine herd boys, a noticeable pretty dress is the short, dark trousers, blue blouse, and black silk cap, with its bright-red border.—*New York

NEW BOOKS BY ROBT G. INGERSOLL

The Field-Ingersoll Discussion. Price, paper, 25 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

In 1888 the Rev. Dr. Henry M. Field wrote an open letter to Colonel Ingersoll, with the intent to convert him. The letter was published in the North American Review, and was replied to by the person addressed. All our older readers know the value of this discussion. To those who do not remember it we can only say that they should lose no time in procuring a copy if they want a controversial treat.

The Ingersoll-Gladstone Controversy about Christianity. Price, paper, 25 cts; cloth, 50 cts.

When the Field-Ingersoll Controversy closed in the North American Review the Christians felt that their champion had been very badly worsted in argument, and the publishers of the Review engaged the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone to attempt to rehabilitate the Presbyterian creed. He wrote a long letter to Colonel Ingersoll, to which the latter replied at length and, it is generally agreed, completely demolished the greatest controversialist Christianity can produce. These letters are now for the first time available in pamphlet form.

Myth and Miracle. Price, 25c.

This is one of Colonel Ingersoll's best lectures, but never before put into print. Everyone who has heard it will most certainly want it, and those who have not heard it will have a rare treat in its perusal, as something new from the Colonel, which also is something that everybody is looking for.

Which Way? Price, 25 cents.

This lecture is a consideration of the difference between the natural and the supernatural, and some reasons why the former is the best way to go. Perhaps no one of Colonel Ingersoll's orations has won more general applause from enlightened audiences than this. It contains that most magnificent of perorations, his visions—"This was. This is. This shall be." The lecture was never before printed in pamphlet form. It is splendid. Send for it.

EDUCOLOGY: The Science of Generative Life. By Sydney Barrington Elliot, M.D. Cloth, $1.50. Sold at this office.

This is a book that every man and woman should read and should possess for frequent reference. It is a valuable treatise on generative life, and deals more particularly with one special phase of the subject to which little or no attention has been given—the power and possibilities of pre-natal influence.

Pre-natal influence is the influence, physical, mental, and moral, which, acting through the parents, affects the unborn child, not only during actual pregnancy, but for some time prior to it. The author has clearly demonstrated that having well-born children is within the reach of almost all parents. The physical, mental, and moral development are each separately considered. It is shown how to impart good physique, strong vital organs, and desirable mental and moral qualities, even under unfavorable circumstances. Talent for special pursuits can be imparted, and numerous cases in point are given—cases of many of the world's most renowned men, showing why they were so, when their parents, brothers, and sisters were entirely lacking in the qualities they possessed. Many opinions and upwards of five hundred cases from the most eminent medical authorities in this country and Europe are given as corroborative evidence of the author's position.

As a natural sequence to pre-natal influence comes the prevention of conception. To have well-born children it is necessary that parents should know how to control procreation, that generation may take place only under the most favorable circumstances. While abortion is condemned in the strongest possible terms, the regulation of procreation by preventing conception, so as best to secure healthy, well-born offspring and limited in every family to the number that can be carefully protected and supported, is strongly recommended and fully indorsed by a strong array of authorities in medicine, law, and theology, from Plato to the present time. Prevention of conception is emphatically declared to be harmless, effectual, and entirely satisfactory.

The last part, on Hygiene and Physiology of the Generative System through all the phases of generative life, from childhood to maturity, is a compilation from the most eminent authorities upon the different subjects discussed, and the most valuable of its kind in circulation. Some of the chapters of this part are on Physical Essentials for Marriage, Sterility, Events of Married Life, Government of Sex in Reproduction, Hygiene of Pregnancy, Painless Parturition, etc., etc. This part treats thoroughly upon all points of interest to married people.

This book, though quite new, has already become famous. Whole pages in many of the largest daily papers, and several pages in leading journals, have been devoted to it. It is most highly recommended by the press, eminent physicians, lawyers, and prominent people of all callings. It is the most authoritative and valuable book on pre-natal influence ever published. It should be carefully read by every thinking man and woman.

Ill-Tempered Babies are not desirable in any home. Insufficient nourishment produces ill-temper. Guard against fretful children by feeding nutritious and digestible food. The Gail Borden Eagle Brand Condensed Milk is the most successful of all infant foods.

NEW EDITION. PROSE-POEMS AND SELECTIONS.

By ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.
Revised and greatly Enlarged. A Handsome Quarto, containing over 400 pages.

The book is designed for, and will be accepted by, admiring friends as a rare personal souvenir. To help it serve this purpose, a fine steel portrait, with autograph fac simile, has been prepared especially for it. In the more elegant styles of binding it is eminently suited for presentation purposes, for any season or occasion.

Gems of Thought.

PATRIOTISM, as some people understand it, is pride in our power to harm the rest of the world.—Puck.

THE average American pulls the cap down over the eyes of liberty and then expects her to see.—Horace L. Traubel.

ONLY largest souls are able to discern and love sincerity of purpose amid the bungling feebleness of achievement.—George Eliot.

IN all lives there is a crisis in the formation of character. It comes from many causes, and from some which on the surface are apparently trivial. But the result is the same; a sudden revelation to ourselves of our secret purposes, and a recognition of our perhaps long shadowed, but now masterful convictions.—Benjamin D'Israeli.

WHEN, Sunday after Sunday, men who profess to be our instructors in righteousness, read out the statement, "In six days the Lord made heaven and earth, the sea, and all that in them is," in innumerable churches, they are either propagating what they may easily know, and therefore are bound to know, to be falsities; or if they use the words in some non-natural sense, they fall below the moral standard of the much-abused Jesuit.—Huxley.

VOLTAIRE approached the mythology of the Jews precisely as he did the mythology of the Greeks and Romans, or the mythology of the Chinese or the Iroquois Indians. There is nothing in this world too sacred to be investigated, to be understood. The philosopher does not hide. Secrecy is not the friend of truth. No man should be reverent at the expense of his reason. Nothing should be worshiped until the reason has been convinced that it is worthy of worship.—Ingersoll.

It is much harder to examine and judge than to take up opinions on trust; and therefore the far greatest part of the world borrow from others those which they entertain concerning all the affairs of life and death. Hence it proceeds that men are so unanimously eager in the pursuit of things, which, far from having any inherent real good, are varnished over with a specious and deceitful gloss, and contain nothing answerable to their appearance. Hence it proceeds on the other hand, that, in those things which are called evils, there is nothing so hard and terrible as the general cry of the world threatens. Thus the multitude has ordained. But the greatest part of their ordinances are abrogated by the wise.—Bolingbroke.

"LOVE is the fulfilling of the law," we are told; but to judge by the hatred that is being preached in every direction, it would seem that not love, but hate is the all-essential factor. All this horrible hatred is the direct result of the disposition to domineer every thing and everybody, and whenever the would-be despot sees himself foiled in his unholy ambition, a destructive hatred takes possession of him. It would be well for all the people if they would closely scrutinize the shibboleths of all would-be leaders. No one can become either morally, mentally, or physically sound until he becomes self-poised, individually, freely investigating and fearlessly thinking out his own conclusions.—Living Issues.

Is it at all surprising that the number of those who hold the opinions of the church in light esteem should so rapidly increase? How can that be received as a trustworthy guide in the invisible, which falls into so many errors in the visible? How can that give confidence in the moral, the spiritual, which has so signally failed in the physical? It is not possible to dispose of these conflicting facts as "empty shadows," "vain devices," "errors wearing the deceitful appearance of truth," as the church stigmatizes them. On the contrary, they are stern witnesses, bearing emphatic and unimpeachable testimony against the ecclesiastical claim to infallibility, and fastening a conviction of ignorance and blindness upon her.—Prof. J. W. Draper.

THE BRAIN AND BIBLE; OR THE CONFLICT BETWEEN MENTAL SCIENCE AND THEOLOGY.

By EDCAR C. BEALL, M.D.,
with a preface by
R. G. INGERSOLL.

This is the only work of its kind in the literature of Freethought. Its arguments are based upon scientific phrenology, and appeal directly to the reader's sense of logic and love of justice. It is eloquent as well as convincing.

Mailed singly for 10 cents each; twelve of any one, or an assortment of twelve, for $1.

AN ANTIDOTE ANALYZED. Reply to a Christian who had attacked Freethinkers, and exposing the inconsistency of Christians generally. H. C. Luse.

BIBLE TEMPERANCE. Showing that Liquor Drinking is Commended, Defended, and Enjoined by the Bible. Edwin O. Walker. CHRISTIANITY A REWARD FOR CRIME. Authenticated by the Bible. O. B. Whitford, M.D.

DID MAN FALL? Is the Garden of Eden a Fact? Israel W. Groh.

EPIDEMIC DELUSIONS. A Lecture by Frederic R. Marvin, M.D. Giving reasonable reasons for Religious and other Delusions.

FALSE CLAIMS OF THE CHURCH. John E. Remsburg's most noted work, and one of the most effective ever written by any Freethinker.

FIRST EPISTLE OF BENNETT THE APOSTLE TO THE TRUTH SEEKERS. Written while journeying in and near the land of Yahweh. Containing the best moral instructions of the world from the great teachers of the former ages. D. M. Bennett.

THE GIANT DELUSION. A paper read before the Freethought International Congress at Chicago. One of Otto Wettstein's fraternal attacks on Spiritualism.

THE GLORY OF INFIDELITY. To which is added a poem on Thomas Paine. One of Samuel P. Putnam's most brilliant lectures. Every Christian who asks the idiotic question, "What Has Infidelity Done?" should be induced to read this book, if he has to be paid to do it.

HOW CAN WE BE SAVED? Was Jesus Supernaturally Conceived, and did he Rise from the Dead? Israel W. Groh.

INGERSOLL AND JESUS. Showing how the two agree. A poem by Samuel P. Putnam.

THE LIMITATIONS OF TOLERATION. A discussion between Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, Hon. Frederic R. Coudert, Ex-Gov. Stewart L. Woodford, before the Nineteenth Century Club of New York. "Each man has the same right to express to the whole world his ideas that the rest of the world have to express their thoughts to him." Colonel Ingersoll maintains this, the others deny it. Mr. Coudert is a Roman Catholic, Mr. Woodford a Protestant.

MATERIALISM: Its History, and Its Influence Upon Society. Dr. Louis Buchner.

MIRACLES AND MIRACLE WORKERS. A Consideration of the Marvels and Miracles of the New Testament. One of John Peck's best books.

MOSES BEFORE THE COURT, or The Forgery of the Old Testament. Dedicated to the Clergy. H. J. Seignuret, M.D.

THE NEW GOD. "It is an open secret that man has always made his Gods. They exist in and through him, as the image exists in and through the mirror. Take away man and you take away God—the image vanishes." This pamphlet, therefore, is a consideration of what kind of a God man should make. Samuel P. Putnam.

ORTHODOXY. A lecture by Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll, and one of that great man's best. The subjects considered are: Orthodox Religion Dying Out, Religious Deaths and Births, The Religion of Reciprocity, Mohammed, The Destruction of Art, The Discovery of America, Copernicus and Kepler, Charles Darwin, Special Providence, The Latest Creed, God as a Governor, The Love of God, The Fall of Man, The Atonement, The Second Birth, Inspiration, The Reign of Truth and Love, The Wars It Brought, The Resurrection, The Judgment Day, Pious Evasions, "No Bible, No Civilization," Miracles of the New Testament, The Ascension, Casting out Devils, Necessity of Belief, Eternal Punishment, Some who are Damned, What I Believe, Immortality. This lecture is on the famous text, "The Clergy know that I know that they do not know."

PERSONAL EXISTENCE AFTER DEATH IMPROBABLE. L. R. Smith.

PROCEEDINGS OF THE CIVIL RIGHTS MASS MEETING AT LINCOLN HALL, WASHINGTON. Being the Speeches of Hon. FREDERICK DOUGLASS and Col. ROBERT G. INGERSOLL on the Decision of the United States Court that the Civil Rights Act is Unconstitutional. Fifty-three large octavo pages, of which Colonel Ingersoll's speech occupies 38 pages.

PULPIT, PEW, AND CRADLE. So long as the Pulpit speaks to believing Pews composed chiefly of mothers, the cradle will be rocked by ghosts and the race will remain on its knees to a devil of its own creation and to a God who is powerless against him. One of Helen Gardner's brightest efforts.

THE RELIGION OF HUMANITY BETTER THAN ETERNAL PUNISHMENT. M. Babcock.

RELIGIOUS PROBLEMS. One of L. K. Washburn's best lectures, and it is, like all of his, very good.

THE ROARING LION ON THE TRACK. One of M. Babcock's comical sermons.

SCIENCE vs. RELIGION, or The Conflict Between Reason and Superstition. T. C. Widdcombe.

ST. MATTHEW BEFORE THE COURT. Presenting the evidence of the forgery of his alleged gospel. H. J. Seignuret.

SISTER LUCY AND HER AWFUL DISCLOSURES REGARDING NEW HALL CONVENT. Showing that Convents are inimical to chastity, virtue, and freedom.

SPIRITUALISM FROM A MATERIALISTIC STANDPOINT. B. F. Underwood. Written before Mr. Underwood joined the Psychic Researchers.

THUMBSCREW AND RACK. Torture Implements Employed in the 15th and 16th centuries for the promulgation of Christianity. Being the Nuremberg Collection, with specimens from the Holy Inquisition. 28 pictures. The descriptions and reflections by George E. Macdonald.

VICTOR HUGO'S ORATION ON VOLTAIRE, delivered on the one hundredth anniversary of Voltaire's death. Translated by James Parton, author of the Life of Voltaire. To which are added the three great poems of Goethe, George Eliot, and Longfellow.

WAS CHRIST CRUCIFIED? Austin Bierbower. A lawyer's consideration of the evidence of that alleged event.

WAS JESUS INSANE? A consideration of Christ's alleged acts which would lead one to that conclusion. L. K. Washburn.

WHY DON'T HE LEND A HAND? And other Agnostic Poems. Samuel P. Putnam. The title poem is perhaps the most popular of Mr. Putnam's many poems, and a great many editions of it have been called for. The other poems are: The Golden Age, The Idea and the Real, Not Dead, but Living, Fruition, Hope, Thomas Paine, Nature's Gospel, Address to Deity, and the short poem so often recited with great effect by Charles Watts, Give Us Light.

WILL THE COMING MAN WORSHIP GOD? B. F. Underwood; written before Mr. Underwood joined the Psychic Researchers.

WOMAN: FOUR CENTURIES OF PROGRESS. A lecture delivered at the Freethinkers' International Congress at Chicago. Considering: The Cause of Woman's Subjugation, The Canon Law and its Effects Upon Her, Theology Never Helpful to Woman, Invention Woman's Friend, Freethought the Benefactor of Woman. Susan H. Wilson.

WOMAN: HER PAST AND PRESENT, HER RIGHTS AND WRONGS. A lecture delivered before the Woman Suffrage Association of Denver, Col., by B. F. Underwood.

Any one of the above for ten cents, and twelve for a dollar.

In the nature of things,

SAYS

ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

"In the nature of things there can be no evidence to establish the claim of inspiration." Such is the text of the Colonel's new lecture entitled

All About the Holy Bible

Just published in a large and handsome pamphlet. Price 25 cents. Address The Truth Seeker Co., New York.

The Great Inger-

sol Controversy

Containing the famous Christmas Sermon by Colonel Ingersoll, the protests thereby evoked from the ministers who think they own this country and all therein, and Colonel Ingersoll's replies to the same. A finely gotten up pamphlet. Price, 25 cents.

Liberty for Man,

Woman, and Child

"Reading this lecture," remarked a friend the other day, "will make men better; for if a man reads it one night on his way home, the next night he will take along some oranges or something to his family." This lecture is gotten up in the handsome style of "Voltaire" and "Lincoln," and has as a frontispiece a fine photo engraving of the Colonel and both his grandchildren, Eva and Robert, the little fellow upon his knee, and Eva in her high chair. It is a pretty picture, and the Colonel's millions of friends will take pleasure in it. In this pamphlet is also the Colonel's Tribute to His Brother, which so many have desired to have in convenient form. Price, 25 cents.

VOLTAIRE

"Voltaire was the greatest man of his century, and did more to free the human race than any other of the sons of men." A lecture by INGERSOLL, with portrait of Voltaire. A handsome pamphlet. Every Freethinker will surely want it. Price, 25 cents.

LINCOLN

This is Colonel INGERSOLL's great lecture, printed in a handsome pamphlet, and containing the Century's famous portrait of Lincoln—said to be the best extant. Price, 25 cents.

SHAKSPERE

"An intellectual ocean, whose waves touched all the shores of thought." A lecture by INGERSOLL, with likeness of Shakspeare from the Kesselstadt death mask. Price, 25 cents.

IS SUICIDE A SIN?

Colonel INGERSOLL's Famous Letters and Replies from Eminent men. With "Great Suicides of History" and Schopenhauer's Essay. 25 cents.

Not for Parsons.

"Tommy," said the visitor, "have you read the books in your Sunday-school library?" "Some of them," he replied, rather doubtfully. "Can you tell me what happened to the boy who went fishing on Sunday?" "Yes; he caught three bullheads and an eel." "How do you know that?" "Cos I was him."

Mrs. GRAY: "Was your prayer-meeting good last night?" Mrs. Green: "Rather uninteresting. None of the men who spoke had ever done anything very bad." Mrs. Gray: "But wasn't Mr. Graybeard there?" Mrs. Green: "Oh, yes; but you don't expect he'd confess any of his real crimes, do you?" Mrs. Gray: "Well, he might run a risk of being arrested."—Ex.

"Oh, well," said Flotsam, "you may laugh at it as a superstition, but the fact remains that it cured my rheumatism. I suffered for ten years, but since I've carried that horse chestnut in my pocket I haven't had a twinge." "You carry a horse chestnut, do you?" asked Skeptics. "Yes," "Let's see it." "Great Apollo! I can't find it. I must have left it in that suit of clothes my wife gave to the ragman last fall."—Judge.

A Scotch chaplain was recently appointed to a prison in a certain town. He was a man who made the most of his office, and entering one of the cells on his first round of inspection, he very pompously addressed the occupant, and the following passage occurred. Chaplain: "Well, sir, do you know who I am?" Prisoner: "No, nor I dinna care." Chaplain: "Well, I am your prison chaplain." Prisoner: "Oh, ye are; weel, I have heard o' ye before." Chaplain (letting his curiosity get the better of his dignity): "And what did ye hear?" Prisoner: "I heard the last two kirks ye were in ye preached them both empty; but ye'll no find it sic an easy matter tae dae the same wi' this ane."

TIM AND JOE.

Tim and Joe were school-boys many years ago; Tim was called a "Christian," an "Agnostic," Joe; Tim would swallow anything, if once it appeared in print; Joe believed in nothing 'thout some logic in't.

Tim was what the boys all called a "goody, goody" boy, A sort o' "milk-and-water" chap, with brains 'bout half alloy; He never had been known to hav a great amount of "snap;" What brains the poor boy had were always fed on "Bible pap."

He scarce could tell a cabbage from a pumpkin, on the farm; What mattered it to him, ignorance here could do harm So long as he was certain that "sinners" all were lost? If they couldn't accept his creed, they must "go to hell or bust."

He'd read the story o'er and o'er 'bout Jonah in a whale, He loved to tell how Samson caught three hundred foxes by the tail, And slew some three score Phillies with the jawbone of an ass, How old King Neb. had eagle's claws and fed himself on grass.

Joe dared to doubt the yarn about Mr. Balaam's talking mule, For this Tim said that Joe would go to a place not very cool, For "Didn't the ass give Balaam's corns against the wall a jam? And didn't Balaam 'cuss' him? and didn't Balaam —?"

Said Joe: "I often wonder why the gift is always given To those who know so little here to know so much of heaven. Why, Tim," said Joe, "the heathen boys make gods of stone and wood— They pray exactly as you do—get answers just as good."

"You pray for rain—they pray for rain—you neither get a drop, But old Dame Nature 'bides her time, then it rains till she says "stop." And as these boys passed on through life, Joe always thought it queer That those who know so much of heaven should know so little here."

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait-painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—[Freethinkers' Magazine.]

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of this volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—[Boston Investigator.]

The Glory of Infidelity

WITH A POEM ON Thomas Paine.

By SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

This is one of the best of Mr. Putnam's works, and no Freethinker or Infidel should be without it, to meet the claims of Christians that Infidelity is an inglorious philosophy.

News of the Week.

CHOLERA is increasing in Tangier, Morocco.

SEVEN of the murderers of missionaries have been executed by the Chinese authorities.

IN the athletic contest on Manhattan Field the American athletes won in all the contests, the English losing all the world's records.

TWO vessels have recently been seized by United States officers on the charge of being engaged in operations against the Spaniards in Cuba.

THE Chickamauga national military park was dedicated on Sept. 19th. There was a concourse of 40,000 people and a great many distinguished speakers.

LATEST estimates are that the corn crop of the United States will reach two billion bushels. Iowa heads the column with about 300,000,000 bushels, and Kansas is second, with Missouri a close third.

THE investigation into the massacre of missionaries at Kucheng has been resumed. The man who gave the order for the slaughter of women in the missions has been summoned to Kucheng for trial.

THE American liner Edam was sunk in a fog in the English Channel. The passengers and crew were saved by a fishing vessel, the Vulture, the ship that wrecked her, the Turkestan, having vanished in the fog.

THE Central Labor Union of New York refused to permit Delegate McGill, of the Plasterers' Union, to serve in the office to which he had been elected because he declined to raise his hand when taking the pledge of office.

THE Belmont-Morgan syndicate which placed the last issue of government bonds has ceased to exist. The contributing members received, including interest, profits to the extent of 6.65 per cent for the time the transaction was pending, an equivalent of about 13 per cent per annum.

IN Italy, the United States, and wherever else there are Italians, the 20th of September was celebrated with great display and rejoicing. It was the twenty-fifth anniversary of the capture of Rome, of the unification of Italy. The pope and the Catholic church generally denounce the celebration in unmeasured terms, and in many churches special prayers for the "prisoner of the Vatican" were offered.

LAST Sunday the police raided the clothing stores in Baxter street, this city, making twenty arrests under the Sabbath law. Many of the poor fruit sellers were also arrested. One man sold a policeman in plain clothes a necktie and another sold him a collar and both spent the night in cells, as did another who sold a policeman a straw hat. Other arrests were made for selling a pair of shoes and a stone jar to masked policemen. All this was in the United States.

AT Willimantic, Conn., on Sept. 21st, Herbert H. Leonard, prosecuting agent for Windham county, called on all the newsdealers, and by threats of prosecuting them, it is said, persuaded them to sign an agreement not to sell Sunday newspapers. The papers were sold the next Sunday by others, however.

BENTON RIDGE, O., has recently suffered from a furious revival of religion, and one of the converts is building a large tank, which he will fill with water, so that another convert can show the depth of his faith by attempting to walk upon its surface. He is likely, incidentally, to show the depth of the water.

ON Sept. 29th Lieut.-Gen. John McAllister Schofield will retire as commander-in-chief of the armies of the United States, and Nelson A. Miles goes to Washington as senior major-general. General Ruger takes Nelson's place as commander of the Department of the East. Miles is not a graduate of West Point.

THE clergy of New York and Brooklyn took occasion on last Sunday to eulogize the Republican convention for its expressed determination to maintain the Sabbath laws. Among the eulogists was Thomas Dixon, whom a very few Liberals have been deluded into thinking possessed of some progressive tendencies.

THE Dominican order of Catholics has a large vineyard somewhere in California, and ships the product East. In Brooklyn there is a convent where the sisters sell wine without a license, supplying a large parish with the beverage at great profit to themselves. Other liquor dealers have complained to the revenue officers.

HARRISON MILLARD, the well-known composer and song writer, died in this city on the 10th inst., of Bright's disease. He was sixty-five years of age. The songs of Millard were commended by President Lincoln in war times; and being severely wounded in the battle of Chickamauga, he was appointed by Mr. Lincoln to a clerkship in the custom house, which he held until 1885.

THE Spanish cruiser Barcistegni was sunk in the harbor of Habana on the night of Sept. 19th by a collision with the merchant ship Montero. Admiral Delgado Parejo, commanding the Spanish forces in Cuban waters, all but one officer of the cruiser, and a number of the crew, making forty-six victims in all, were drowned. Later the Cubans claim that the ship was destroyed by a torpedo sent against her by an insurgent launch.

It is reported that the Cuban patriots have captured the port of Banes on the north coast, which was the first step toward the launching of the Cuban navy, said to be ready in various ports of other countries. It is expected that Mexico and other states will soon recognize the belligerency of Cuba, thus opening neutral ports for the coating and refitting of the patriot fleet. Spain will dispatch 25,000 more troops to the island in October and 50,000 in January. Rev. W. H. Thomas, the distinguished minister in Chicago, said in a sermon last Sunday that the time had come for the United States to prevent further oppression in Cuba.

ON Sept. 18th the Atlanta Exposition was opened. Two of the most notable of the incidents of the day were the speech of Prof. Booker T. Washington, Negro, president of the Tuskegee Normal and Industrial Institute, and the appearance of a body of Negro soldiers marching with the white troops of Georgia and Louisiana. Professor Washington's address was greeted with the wildest applause by the immense audience, and prominent Southerners say that it marks the beginning of a new era in the South. The exposition promises to be a great success, although the movement was started in the midst of the financial depression and when the Southern banks were issuing scrip to tide over the business difficulties.

Sept. 21st was the warmest day of that date in New York for fourteen years and Sept. 22d the warmest of that date in twenty-five years. Both days were hotter than any previous days of the same year, the thermometer registering 96 degrees in the shade at the top of the Equitable building where the United States meteorological station is situated. The heat was continuous all day, having been 81 at 1 A.M. and 79 at midnight Sunday. At the same time, a very cold wave swept over the Far West. In Wyoming there was a snow blizzard the like of which had not before been seen in September in that region for twenty-five years. Snow fell over a wide area in the Rockies and adjacent territory and the temperature fell with phenomenal rapidity. Chicago had the three hottest consecutive days of the season. At La Crosse there was on the 22d a storm with a 50-mile wind and the mercury fell 44 degrees in 30 minutes. At Wichita the mercury dropped 50 degrees, getting down to 45. At Marengo, Ill., the mercury went down on the breath of a cold storm from 99 to 40. At Minneapolis 2.81 inches of rain fell.

CONDEMNED BY THEIR OWN DECLARATIONS—WHAT KEEPS SOME CHRISTIANS FROM COMMITTING CRIME.

Special NEW SUBSCRIBER Offer.

We wish, for two good and valid reasons, to greatly extend the circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER. First, we want its influence for good and its efforts for greater liberty of thought to be more widely distributed, and consequently more effective. Second, we want more subscribers to help pay its expenses and enable us to do more work. And we wish to emphasize both of these reasons. Our present subscribers can do a great deal for us if they will, and to get them to aid us we are willing to reward them; we therefore make this SPECIAL NEW SUBSCRIBER OFFER:

To any subscriber now on our list who will get a new name for the list for one year, sending us three dollars for the same, we will send free a copy of the FREETHINKER'S PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK, in board covers (price two dollars).

And to anyone whose name is not now on our list we make this offer: Send us three dollars for the paper one year, and we will send you free the PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK.

The pictures in the FREETHINKER'S PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK were made and the text written to show the absurdity and untruthfulness of the Church's claim to being a divine and infallible institution, and to reveal the abuses of a union of church and state. It has 185 Full-page Illustrations, with copious citations of Facts, History, Statistics, and Opinions of Scholars to maintain the argument of the Artist. The Designs are by WATSON HESTON and include a portrait of the designer. The pictures are classified as follows: Of those representing Uncle Sam and the Priests there are 16; representing The Church Robbing the People, 2; Thanksgiving, 3; Sabbath Laws, 6; Children and the Church, 11; Woman and the Church, 10; The Church and Thomas Paine, 6; Studies in Natural History, 4; The Bible and Science, 2; The Clergy and Their Flocks, 15; Piety in Our Penitentiaries, 1; The Atonement Scheme, 4; The Lord and His Works, 4; Prayer, 2; The Creeds, 10; Christians and Mohammedans, 1; Samples of Christianity's Work, 2; Missionaries, 5; The Lord's Instruments, 1; Bible Doctrines and Their Results, 25; Church and Slavery, 1; Priests and Politics, 2; Ireland and the Church, 4; Church Ideas of Civilization, 2; Uses of the Cross, 1; Unkind Reflections on the Church, 4; Persecutions by the Church, 9; Some Allegories, 12; Heaven, 3; Hell, 6; Miscellaneous, 7.

This offer cannot apply to renewals. Premiums for them can be found on the second page of this issue. We are giving five dollars' worth for three in this offer, and there is no profit in it except that we shall get many renewals of these subscriptions; the subscribers will also, probably, buy a few books from time to time, and the small margin on them may make us whole. Induce your neighbor to subscribe, and so get the book for yourself. Or, if you are not now a subscriber, send us three dollars and get both paper and book—FIVE DOLLARS' WORTH FOR THREE DOLLARS.

Read what the papers and people have said of the book and see if it is not worth while to make a strong effort to obtain it. The book has had a large run; five thousand copies have been sold, and everyone who paid two dollars for it says it is worth a good deal more. Now we are giving it away, and you can get a copy if you will. Do not delay, but get it now.

SPECIMEN PRESS NOTICES.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait-painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—Freethinkers' Magazine.

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of this volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—Boston Investigator.

Send us a new subscriber and get the book free of all expense to you. Or, if you are not now a subscriber, send us $3 and get the book and the paper for one year.

When Renewing Your Subscription, Take Advantage of These Good Offers.

For $6.50 we will send THE TRUTH SEEKER one year ($3) and S. P. Putnam's "Four Hundred Years of Freethought" ($5). Large Octavo, 1150 pages, gilt sides and back, marbled edges—the most magnificent work ever issued by the Freethought Press. 140 Half Tone Engravings of the Prominent Freethinkers of the past four centuries.

The object of this work is to present the Course of Freethought throughout the Civilized World from the time of Columbus and Bruno to the time of Ingersoll. It is a radical Historic Record of the greatest developments of the human race. It reveals Freethought as an intellectual, moral, literary, social, industrial, and political movement. It shows what Freethought is in itself, how manifold are its influences, and with what promise we can hail its future triumph. "FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT" embraces the most illustrious pages of human history, adorned with the brightest genius, radiant with the most splendid poetry, rich with the greatest inventions and discoveries, and ennobled with freedom's most shining advance. Nothing can be more interesting or more inspiring to the pioneer workers of to-day, to those who are still in the van for human rights and progress. No Liberal can afford to be without this book. It contains the greatest thoughts and the greatest deeds of the greatest men in one harmonious and magnificent whole, a vivid picture of man's sublimest evolution, with the added glory of woman's emancipation from the chains and slavery of a barbaric church.

Darwin and After Darwin.

An Exposition of the Darwinian Theory.

By GEORGE J. ROMANES.

A systematic Exposition of what may be termed the Darwinism of Darwin, and intended to be of service to the general reader rather than to professional naturalists.

Mr. Romanes is well known as one of the most interesting of English writers upon evolution, besides ranking with Professor Huxley in scientific knowledge and ability. And this is a part of his conclusion regarding the great subject of Design, to which the church so often refers: "Thus whether we look to the facts of adaptation or to those of beauty, everywhere throughout organic nature we meet with abundant evidence of natural causation, while nowhere do we meet with any independent evidence of supernatural design. Adaptation and beauty are alike receiving their explanation at the hands of a purely mechanical philosophy. All nature has thus been transformed before the view of the present generation in a manner and to an extent that has never before been possible; and inasmuch as the change which has taken place has taken place in the direction of naturalism, and this to the extent of rendering the mechanical interpretation of nature universal, it is no wonder if the religious mind has suddenly awakened to a new and a terrible force in the words of its traditional enemy—Where is now thy God?"

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with a little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroine. The narrative is, in the main, a history of a working-girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business-men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrites. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world.

Working Together for Evil.

The Catholic News of New York reports a sermon by Father Belford, of Brooklyn, that is very interesting reading when taken in connection with the pronouncement we reprinted two weeks ago from the Christian Reformer. We will begin with this comparatively mild statement:

"The true church must make its members good citizens. The Catholic church is the friend of every legitimate government, but it is independent of any. No doubt the church, like men, finds one form of government more favorable to its interests and development, but she succeeds under all, and she helps all by teaching obedience to authority and fostering every good gift with which God has blessed man."

If as a test of its genuineness the "true church must make its members good citizens," it would seem to follow that the Catholic is not that true church. This is not saying that a vast number of Catholics are not good citizens, but the evidence is not forthcoming that the majority of these are made good citizens by the teachings of the church; while, on the other hand, there is a large element who owe faithful spiritual allegiance to the church but are sadly lacking in the qualifications of good citizens. We think that even Father Belford would admit thus much, especially if he should carefully examine the records of the penal and reformatory institutions of the country. How, then, can he honestly say that the true church "must" make its members good citizens? There is no qualification here—"its members," as he uses the expression, must mean all its members. To say that a part of its members are good citizens is to say nothing, for any church can say that, whether it is a "true" church or a false church, and the same can be said for those outside of all churches.

It is not true that the Catholic church is independent of any government. On the contrary, it is dependent on every government that grants it special favors, as the United States and the several states grant special favors to all denominations. The church secures millions yearly through the exemption of its property from equal taxation, and to this extent it is dependent on the government. From the United States it has also received large sums in connection with its Indian schools, and from New York and Arizona it has likewise obtained millions for various purposes. While it has not until recently taken so active an interest in the enactment and enforcement of Sunday laws as have the Protestant churches, it is now awakening to the importance of that form of heresy hunting, and hereafter will be found in the front ranks of those who are striving to force all the people to observe as a holy day the Sabbath of the Catholic church. No, the Catholic church is not independent of government, but as it once dominated all government, and as it never changes in purpose, it can be accepted as indisputable that its ambition, like the ambition of the Protestant theocrats, is to make all governments dependent on the church. Farther along Father Belford says the same thing, only in slightly more disguised phraseology. Priest and preacher alike grow bold as they near the goal of success.

It is very true that the church teaches obedience to authority. She could never have become the conscience-keeper of mankind if she had not insisted that obedience was the supreme virtue. It is especially important that she insist upon that now that the people have the ballot in their hands. They have tasted power and may become restive under the rule of sacerdotal tyrants. It is vitally necessary to the church that they be taught to submit to all laws that they have been induced to enact, for many of those laws are directly inimical to their own well-being and are solely for the increase of the prestige and wealth of the church. They must be taught to reverence law as law, lest they refuse to be slaves for the benefit of their civil and spiritual task-masters. They must be made to lose sight of the Constitution and of the equal justice that should protect all men, regardless of their numbers or of their beliefs, and to fix their eyes on the Will-o-the-Wisp of statism.

"Neither are the people absolute. Their authority is not a right; it is a trust held from God, to whom they are accountable for the use they make of it. The church cannot interfere with the state, but she can say that a law is unjust and that it may not be obeyed. In judging the church for things done in the Middle Ages, we must not separate her from the age or state of society."

No, the people are not absolute, that is, the majority have not in equity an absolute right to dispose of the property, liberty, and lives of the minority. But it is not true that their authority is a "trust held from God," and when the church assumes to nullify human law in the name of God she trespasses, although it may be that, in given instances, the law is wrong and she is right. Then she speaks truth, but speaks it in a forged name. To the reasoning mind it is manifest that if a law is unjust it is not God who is wronged but the human victims of the statute, and hence the appeal from the legislature is not to God but to the individual. The legislature is not accountable to God or to gods but to the source of its authority, the people, and if the people, aggregated, themselves do wrong, the wrong is done to the minority whom they oppress, not to denizens of other worlds, if such there be. The church should not interfere with the state, but she does interfere, always has interfered, and shows no sign of an intention to cease her interference, although the fundamental law of the United States sternly forbids all interference of the kind. And the trouble is that she does not interfere to make more secure the rights of men and women, to keep separate the church and state, but she interferes to weaken and overthrow the rights of men and women by uniting church and state. True it is that she may say that a law is unjust and is not to be obeyed, but this not because she claims a commission from the skies. She can say that, as every other society can say it, as every individual can say it, by virtue of the instinct of self-defense inherent in every organism, just as the Freethinker says it when contemplating the monstrous Sabbath laws enacted at the command of the church, just as the victim of the Catholic Inquisition might have said it, just as the Jew may say it in Russia to-day.

In passing, it will be well to notice Father Belford's plea for the Catholic church of the Middle Ages. He says that in judging her for the acts done then we must not separate her from the age or state of society. But why not, pray? If she is the church of God, instituted by the Son of God, and if into the hands of her high priest he put the keys of heaven and the sword of earthly authority, she is above ages and states of society, as it is claimed that God is, and therefore she molds circumstances instead of being molded by them. When the church ceases to make the arrogant claim that she is the church of God, the one true church, through the ministrations of whose priests alone men can be purged of sin and ticketed for heaven, we will consider the extenuating circumstances alluded to by the Brooklyn pastor, but not before.

"Enemies of the church do not hesitate to say that she saved Europe, that she was the only moral power in the world. The church looks upon the American Republic as a legitimate government. She approves the Constitution, but she does not say that it is an ideal government. She believes that it is possible to construct a government in which church and state will remain distinct, but in which the influence of religion will be more felt and its rights more respected."

Saved Europe from what? From herself? Certainly the people of Europe have never had a more dangerous foe, not even in the worst of their most despotic civil governments. In what did her alleged morality consist? In her remorseless crushing of freedom of thought and expression? In such moral influences as the thumbscrew, the rack, the iron boot, the stake? In her celibate priesthood? Was her moral influence manifested in the extirpation of Moorish civilization in Spain and the cruel slaughter of the Jews? Was the papal court moral? In what aspect could the Crusades be considered a movement of moral regeneration? Or the merciless massacres of the Albigenses, the Waldenses, the Huguenots?

The Catholic church approves the Constitution, but she does not approve it! That is not a contradiction. It is a Jesuitism. The Protestant theocrats talk in the same way. They all like the Constitution in so far as it does not curtail their own liberties. They do not like it in so far as it guarantees the equal liberty of dissenters. If either class felt sure of the possession of sufficient power we should very quickly hear the demand for the recognition of that particular division of the church. But as they are in deadly fear of each other they have to content themselves with a guarded request for a greater recognition of the influence of religion. In fact, of course, the state cannot recognize religion without recognizing the church. That the priests and preachers very well know, but they think that the people are too stupid to see it, and they do not reckon without their host, so far as the masses are concerned. Both divisions of the army of reaction make the same claim that "it is possible to construct a government in which church and state will remain distinct, but in which the influence of religion will be more felt and its rights more respected." Here they stand, Catholic and Protestant, on the same platform. We know how the Protestants want to keep church and state "distinct." Sabbath laws, Bible in the schools, God, Christ, and Bible in the Constitution—those are a few only of the knives that they would use to cut the connecting bonds of church and state! What hypocrites they are! And what fools we would be were we deceived by their transparent devices!

Under the Constitution there is absolute freedom of religious worship for the Christian. The circulation of the Bible is unhindered. Any man can become a minister, and can preach freely to whoever chooses to listen to him. The churches can accumulate property, engage in home and foreign missionary work, and in every other way propagate their creeds uninterfered with by the civil powers. And yet, in the face of all this, here come the Covenanters and the Catholics clamoring for a government under which the rights of religion will be "more respected"! How could the rights of the church be more respected than they are now? What does this astonishing demand mean? The church could have no greater liberty than it has to-day except the liberty to rob more and enslave more fully, and that would not be liberty but usurpation. This demand means that the church wants the opportunity to dictate to the citizen how he shall conduct himself on the first day of the week, what views he shall hold in order to exercise the functions of an elector and a public official, how he shall live his private life, and what he shall say, print, write, paint, and send through the mails. Two weeks ago we laid before our readers the utterances of the foremost representatives of Protestant ecclesiasticism; we reproduced the demand of the Christian Reformer and the Christian Statesman, that is to say, the demand of the National Reform Association, the Sabbath Unions, and allied organizations, that THE TRUTH SEEKER be denied the use of the mails and that "blasphemy" be punished by law. That is what Protestant theocrats mean when they ask for a government that will accord opportunity for greater influence to the church and will more respect the "rights" of religion. What Catholics mean by the same request may be judged from these words of Father Belford's:

"She looks with dread upon indifference in religion, and on the fact that in this country, out of 65,000,000 of people, only 20,000,000 are Christians and less than 7,000,000 are Catholics. She cannot obey any law that makes marriage dissolvable except by death. She cannot but protest against any system of education that teaches error or fails to teach religion. She holds that there is not more right to spread the poison of error than the poison of disease, and she holds that the state should control the speaker and writer of evil as well as the maniac and the leper."

The priest is not unaware of the fact that the strength of the church is greater than these figures, at first glance, would indicate it to be, for to every church member must be added a certain percentage of the members of his own family who are under the age of discretion but who count the same as adults in the census. This makes the total of nominal church adherents about two-and-a-half times the total of church communicants, for the Protestants, and about fifteen per cent more than the number of communicants for the Catholics. Thus there is a grand total of about 57,000,000 of communicants and juvenal adherents. But it is very certain that the rolls of membership, especially in Protestant churches, are not to be relied on for accuracy, as competent Protestant witnesses whom we have recently quoted in these columns have testified, and as it is from these membership rolls and from the church officers that the census enumerators got the figures given above it will be only fair to deduct several millions from the grand total of 57,000,000 church adherents, reducing it to 45,000,000, or 50,000,000 at the most, which is still large enough to fill the mind of every friend of equal liberty and every true patriot with the gravest apprehensions.

The Catholic church sets herself against civil marriage and the divorce that logically is permissible under civil marriage laws. When marriage is held to be a sacrament it is easily seen that we can not admit the validity of divorce, but once it is conceded that marriage is simply a civil contract, it inevitably follows that the contract is dissolvable, as are all other civil contracts. Sentiment in ultra Protestant circles is gravitating rapidly towards Rome as regards marriage and divorce, as in other particulars, and so we find the theocratic party demanding that only "Christ's law of divorce" shall be recognized by the state, meaning that divorce shall be granted only for adultery, and permission to remarry denied. The difference between the Catholic position and the position of the reactionary Protestants is comparatively slight, much less than the difference between that of the latter and that occupied by the progressive element in the Protestant churches and those not affiliating with any church. Aside from the sectarian strife over the question of religious education in the common schools, the Catholic church and all the backward-looking elements in the Protestant churches are practically one army, and for the Freethinker there is not the turning of a wrist in choosing between the two.

In the last lines that we have quoted from Father Belford the reader will see that the same position, precisely, is taken by the Catholic priest that was taken by Dr. McAllister, Dr. George, and the other Protestant priests who are responsible for the attack upon THE TRUTH SEEKER and the liberty of utterance for which it stands, which attack we quoted and commented upon at length in our issue of September 21st. Here there is not the slightest difference in the platform of the Catholic and Protestant. Unlike political platforms, these platforms are not constructed merely to get in on, but they are made to stand on, TO ACT ON, TO ENFORCE TO THE LETTER AND BEYOND. Blasphemy laws and heresy laws are to be revived and enforced; Freethought is to be "stamped out"; Christianity is to have another noontide, civilization another midnight, the Dark Ages are to come again. In this, Rome and Geneva are one in purpose and method.

Canada's Greatest Essayist on the Action of Canada's Postmaster-General.

THE GRANGE, TORONTO, Sept. 30th.

DEAR SIR: You may be sure that you will always find me on the side of perfect freedom of opinion. Beliefs which cannot maintain themselves by arguments in fair lists against all comers, ought not to be maintained at all.

In the number of THE TRUTH SEEKER which you have sent me there is much to which believers in Christianity would object, as they would to many of the utterances of my late friends, Professors Huxley and Tyndall. But there is nothing, so far as I can see, to justify or excuse the exclusion of your journal from circulation.

Yours faithfully, GOLDWIN SMITH.

To E. M. MACDONALD,

Editor THE TRUTH SEEKER, New York.

The Cartoon.

The Christian often declares to the Freethinker: "If I believed as you do, I would lie, rob, murder, or commit any other crime." Hence it follows that the moral influence of Christianity does not make the believer either moral or good at heart, as it fails to eradicate the desire to do wrong; and the Christian is deterred from crime, not from any love of morality and right, but only through the influence of brutal superstition and cowardice. If the Christian would not commit the crimes he says he would, then he either tells a falsehood or exposes his ignorance of the true basis of morality, and his declaration reflects no credit on his religion, his morals, or his judgment. Verily, what infamously bad people those Christians are at heart, if we can believe their own assertions, and how contemptible must be that creed which instead of making men truly good, only deters them from crime through fear!

The Republican platform in this state declares for the "maintenance" of the Sunday law "in the interest of labor and morality." But that is all sham, of course, meant to cover the surrender to the church. This is shown by the utterances of the Tribune, the senior Republican organ, which talks piously about Sabbath "desecration," calls the Democratic convention "the Sunday Desecration convention," prates of the "sacredness of Sunday," and in every other way tries to make it appear that Sunday as a holy day should be maintained by law. It remains to be seen how much longer liberty-loving people are going to be fooled by the "rest" and "morality" confidence game.

A hit-or-miss Prohibition publication says that THE TRUTH SEEKER is an "apologist for the liquor interest." Of course the editor knows—if knowledge can be assumed as one of his possessions—that we are no more apologizing for the liquor interest than he would be apologizing for the Presbyterian church if he should protest against its forcible suppression.

The Scottsboro, Alabama, Age says that Judge Bilbro's "devotional exercises in the opening of his court win praise from all church people." Undoubtedly. If he should issue an omnibus injunction restraining all the people in his diocese—beg pardon, we mean jurisdiction—from absenting themselves from religious services on Sunday it is probable that that act would also "win praise from all church people." "Religious liberty," as they understand it, means the liberty to do as they please at the expense of other folks.

A prohibition paper has yet to learn that Harman and Wise in Kansas are imprisoned under United States instead of state law, and therefore have been arrested and prosecuted by federal instead of state officials, so that neither of the parties recently or at present dominant in that state is responsible for the persecutions. The Comstock postal statutes put Harman and Wise in prison, and for those laws members of Congress of both the chief parties are responsible. So also representatives of both organizations favored the God-in-the-Constitution amendment to the Constitution. Freethinkers, in voting for members of Congress and for state legislators, have to watch men rather than parties.

"We have certain laws in reference to the Sabbath. Certain work and certain things shall not be done on the Sabbath day. The Republican party has taken the position that these laws are right and they dare not retreat from it."

So said Warner Miller with white face and trembling voice in the Republican convention in this state, and his earnestness scattered the plans of the bosses and carried the convention for the "maintenance" of the Sabbath laws. In the light of his interpretation, what becomes of the plea of many of the persons active in the Sabbath law enforcement fight that they want the law enforced merely because it is the law and that such enforcement will and is intended to lead to its modification or repeal? Miller says that the laws in question are right and hence must not only be enforced now, but kept on the statute books for all time. So, after all, this battle is not simply one for the maintenance of law, as law, but for the maintenance of the church's Sabbath law, as a Sabbath law. It would seem that the atmosphere is getting clear enough for even the "no danger" people to see at least the headlines of the theocrats' program.

In the struggle for equal liberty no dependence can be placed in the partisan press, religious, political, or other. The Turners of Syracuse have demanded the repeal of the present excise laws of the state and the legalization of the Sunday opening of art institutes, libraries, music halls, theaters, and agricultural and industrial expositions. Whereupon the Morning Journal declares that while "local option must come," "the secularization of the American Sunday will never be accorded." It was but a few weeks ago that this very paper said that the people of New York would never submit to the "Puritanical observance of Sunday in defiance of our constitutional guarantee of religious liberty." This it affirmed definitely:

"To force upon the people the cessation of all their ordinary amusements or occupations for a Puritanical Sunday is to compel a religious observance of a certain day, and such legislation is in violation of our constitutional rights. The people at large, we are sure, love a quiet Sunday, but there is no authority to compel them to it."

Why this right-about face? How comes it that the Morning Journal has so suddenly discovered that one of the reforms it was then demanding and supporting by unanswerable argument will "never be accorded," while the other, local option,

"must come"? The answer is found in the fact that in the interval between the two declarations its party has held a state convention and pronounced for local option, but has dodged the Sabbath law issue where it has not pronounced for such a law in the interest of "morality and temperance." The Journal has no principles but the expediences of peanut politicians.

"A man ought to be true to his party. That is why we are here, and we have come to stay. Break us, will you, ye dirty politicians? Well, break, and be damned in the hell of honest history. The breaking boughs, the falling trunks, the snapping roots will testify the truth even in death, and church and country in the generations that are coming on shall speak in honor of the 'whip' of God's unorganized democracy, the Prohibition party."

That is a sample piece of scoria thrown out by that volcano of pious "reform," John G. Woolley, while in a state of eruption at Boston the other day. It may be well to explain for the benefit of some of our American readers that a "whip" is a member of a political party whose duty it is to "round up" the representatives of his party in the legislative body and have them at hand when a vote is to be taken. The term is an English one and has not yet been acclimatized in the United States. This being understood, the significance of Mr. Woolley's remark becomes apparent at once. The Prohibition party is the divinely-appointed "whip" to bring "God's unorganized democracy" up to the polls to vote for Sabbath laws and all the other "reforms" dear to the heart of the pious paternalist.

Nothing is more true than that the worshipers of the unjust laws of to-day are also the worshipers of the violators of the unjust laws of the past. The pantheon of humanity is filled with the statues of the glorified rebels. Those who are the readiest to crucify the thinker and the freeman of this age are the loudest in their praises of the persecuted thinkers and freemen of the ages gone. Even the preachers who are in a delirium of savage joy over the enforcement of the Sabbath law "because it is law," gladly lay their sacrifices on the altars of the dead insurgent heroes, real or mythical. Here, for instance, is Dr. Talmage, preaching on the legend of Daniel in the den of lions. He says:

"I suppose the people in the street gathered under and before his window and said: 'Just see that man defying the law! He ought to be arrested.' And the constabulary of the city rush to the police headquarters and report that Daniel is on his knees at the wide open window. 'You are my prisoner,' says the officer of the law, dropping a heavy hand on the shoulder of the kneeling Daniel."

Cannot Talmage and his fellow-persecutors see the application of this to the existing conditions and the actors in the great drama now on the stage?

A few weeks ago we had occasion to quote and comment on a story for children told by the Sunday-school Times, in which a little girl would not come away from the open window during a severe electrical storm because she had been told that "God" would always take care of her. We severely denounced such false teachings and the paper which carried them to hundreds of thousands of children who are not old enough to know that the forces of nature are no respecters of persons and take no cognizance of faith and childish trust. The Christian Reformer quotes a part of the paragraph and then says, referring to our indignant denial that THE TRUTH SEEKER is immoral, "Its own blasphemy is not demoralizing, but faith in God is." Exposure of Christian humbug is always "blasphemy," of course, and of all Christian humbugs the delusion of divine providence is one of the most gross, so we suppose that the theocratic editor really thinks we are "blasphemous." This is a reluctant concession of his honesty at the expense of his intellect. But really, in spite of this concession, it is very difficult to think that an educated man in this age of the world can believe that the forces of nature can be stayed or turned aside by the faith of the religious devotee. Before accusing us of "blasphemy" in saying that "lightning will kill the trusting child as quickly as it will the worst criminal in the world" it would have been well for the Christian Reformer to explain why so many churches have been struck by lightning this season, in some instances wounding or killing several of the worshipers, as at Quakertown, N. J. In its own city of Allegheny three churches of its own denominational family, the Presbyterian, were struck in one day, as the dailies reported. Which is the more "blasphemous," Dr. McAllister, this fact or our mention of it?

The Freethought Letter Writing Corps will this week pour in upon Adolph Caron, postmaster-general of Canada, a flood of protests against the exclusion of THE TRUTH SEEKER from the Canadian mails. And for this purpose the Corps is composed of not only the regularly enlisted members but of all other readers as well. No matter where you reside, write, argue, protest. All subscribers in Canada should denounce this outrage upon their rights, committed by a mere executive officer, a servant of theirs, who has no more moral right to prescribe what they may receive through the mails and read than has the czar of Russia or the Arkoon of Swat. Subscribers in the United States and elsewhere outside of Canada are equally concerned in this matter and their remonstrances should be heard with those of their brethren in the Dominion. All are interested in the paper, all desire its prosperity, all will suffer to the degree that this usurping bigot's ruling affects for ill the cause represented by THE TRUTH SEEKER. Within the next two weeks Postmaster-General Caron should receive thousands of letters that will challenge his attention and compel him to ask himself what justification he has for this high-handed proceeding. Request him to tell you what it is that he objects to in the paper and why he objects to it. Put him on the defensive, in his own thought and conscience at least, even if you cannot extract from him a single written or printed word in vindication or extenuation of his despotic conduct. His address is Ottawa, Canada. Now all together.

Oppressive statutes and the endeavor to enforce them are the most prolific producers of hypocrisy. Every step in the latter-day Sabbatarian march to empire multifariously illustrates this fact. Tennessee, where the war against the Adventists is hottest and most unrelenting, is naturally fairly overrun with hypocrites. We have recently called attention to a few of them. Here is another. W. P. McDonald is the editor of the Spring City Herald. In that capacity he has done his full share of shrieking for the enforcement of the law in the case of the Adventists, "because it is the law." He is also the captain of Company "G," 2d Battalion, N. G. S. T. In the latter capacity he on August 5th published in a Spring City paper—while eight Seventh-Day Adventists were serving in the chain-gang there for "violating the Sabbath"—an order to his company directing its members to assemble in the armory at 2 P.M. of Sunday, August 18th, for the purpose of starting on the march to the state encampment at Crossville. Failure to obey the order would be followed by arrest and punishment. And yet the Constitution of Tennessee says that "no person shall, in time of peace, be required to perform any service to the public on any day set apart by his religion as a day of rest." Blessed be the hypocrites, for they shall inherit the kingdom of cant. In this connection one of the editors of the American Sentinel writes:

"Sunday, June 30th, just on the eve of the session of the court at which the Rhea County Adventists were convicted for Sunday work, one for lifting a wheelbarrow over a fence, the writer of this note saw state militia marching in the streets of Dayton, almost in the shadow of the court house in which the Adventists were sentenced three days later."

Facing foes as unscrupulous as these, who can believe that the battle for equal liberty is won, or that it can be won without united action and desperate fighting all along the line?

The logic of the partisan and fetich worshiper is something marvelous in its way. The New York Tribune, referring to the Warner Miller resolution adopted by the state convention of the Republican party, pledging that party to the "maintenance"—not enforcement, merely, mind you—of the Sabbath law, says: "So now the Republican party of this state stands to-day—for what? For a 'blue law'? Not at all. Democrats enacted it. Republicans offer no apology for enforcing it." This is at once insincere and sophistical. It is insincere because Miller's resolution commits the party to the maintenance of the Sabbath law as well as to its enforcement—or, rather, enforcement must be considered as only the condition of maintenance, that is, the indefinite continuation of the Sabbath régime while the Republican party has it in its power to repeal the Sunday statutes. The Tribune's assertion is sophistical because it implies that the concealment by the "fence" of the booty of the burglar relieves both from the charge of theft. In other words, a blue law is not a blue law if one party enacts it and another enforces it! Reduced to the syllogistic form the Tribune's reasoning would have this appearance:

That only is murder in which the crime is planned and executed by the same person.

In the case of the killing of Smith by Brown, it is established that Williams planned the deed.

Therefore Smith was not murdered.

Would-be criminals will please take notice and guard against punishment accordingly. Again the Tribune: "Does it [the Republican party] stand for 'bigotry'? Not at all. There is no bigotry in a law which one party passes and another, accepting its duty and its responsibility, rigidly enforces." This is equivalent to saying that if a Methodist majority enacts a law for the suppression of Free-thought literature and a succeeding Baptist majority enforces it there is no bigotry in the law nor in the intentions of its enactors and enforcers. White-law Reid should get off the editorial tripod and go to school again for a few years, taking his place at the foot of the primary class.

A discursiv contemporary, before mentioned, confounds the tentative declaration made by the Conference of Political Reforms at Prohibition Park with the platform of the Prohibition party, and by so doing renders even more pointless all its criticisms of our comments upon it. That conference was not a convention of the Prohibition party, but a gathering of representatives of various "reform" forces, and its purpose was accomplished when it put out this declaration upon which all could agree. The conference acted in harmony with the plan formulated by Woolley, which contemplated the election of executive officers to enforce all existing laws (necessarily including all Sabbath statutes), the leverage thus given to enable them to secure more repressive statutes and finally to put into power the "new clean party built on Jesus Christ," the party through which "the church is in politics," the party built up on the plan that "honors the church and enforces the Sabbath." Like many other "reforms" within the scope of the "plan," Sabbath observance enforcement was understood instead of expressed, because it was the policy to express nothing that would drive away possible adherents, like the receptive editor of the discursiv contemporary. This latter gentleman does not distinguish between "anti" and "non," although the two locutions are utterly dissimilar in meaning. He speaks of the "anti-Sunday plank in the Prohibition platform," when he means only the omission of allusion to the Sunday issue in the tentative declaration, not of the Prohibition party, but of the Conference of Political Reforms. On the surface, the declaration is non-Sabbatarian, not anti-Sabbatarian, but the purpose of the overwhelming majority of its acceptors is pro-Sabbatarian. As to the Prohibition party, the discursiv contemporary says that it "is the nearest approach to an Infidel party known to American politics." We suppose that this must be so, for "extremes meet." The funniest of funny things about this whole business is the lumping of Cleveland, Harrison, and Bidwell together as Presbyterians and denouncing them as such in the attempt to prove that the other parties are all more religious than the Prohibition. Evidently no one has yet told our discursiv contemporary that General Bidwell was the Prohibition candidate for president in 1892.

Call for the Annual Congress.

NEW YORK, OCTOBER 25TH, 26TH, AND 27TH.

To the Liberals of America, Members of the Freethought Federation and Secular Union, and all Societies organized for the Purpose of maintaining a purely Secular Government.

It is of great importance that Freethinkers should combine. It is of more importance now than at any previous period, for there is more work to do and the work cannot be done by isolated effort. There are vast ecclesiastical combinations organized for the express purpose of overthrowing Freethought, and also of uniting church and state in a more dangerous form than ever before. These questions immediately confront us:

The Taxation of Church Property,
The Bible in the Public Schools,
The Sabbath Laws, and
The Liberty of the Press.

Property to the value of a billion of dollars is exempt from taxation in the American Republic, in many places religious exercises in the public schools are on the increase, and the very foundation of universal education is being destroyed. The conflict in regard to Sabbath laws is now waged both in the states and in the national Congress, and a centralized political power is being established for the purpose of aggrandizing the authority of the church in civil matters; and honest Freethinkers are imprisoned to-day for discussing questions of the utmost importance to human improvement. Against these flagrant and ever accumulating acts of injustice we must unitedly contend. Freethinkers throughout the Union, in every state, county, city, and village, should be in active communication, and ready to meet at any point the encroachments of the church. It is often the case that a Freethinker is alone in his community in the open support of Liberal thought and principles, and for this reason suffers persecutions. Religious bigots assume that they can trample upon the Freethinker's rights with impunity on account of their own vast majority.

When it is well understood that the Freethinkers of this country are joined together and will defend one another at all hazards, the rights of Freethought will be respected and the individual Freethinker will have the power of numbers to support his cause. The theologian is naturally a coward. He persecutes only the minority. He does not trust in God unless God has a big majority. When the theologian realizes that the Freethinker is not a solitary unit, but the representative of a great force, he will not only cease his persecutions, but even welcome him to social equality. A theologian is very considerate towards a powerful party, however much he despises the humble citizen.

There is a great contest before us. We must be an organized party or submit to defeat and ostracism. We cannot fold our hands and do nothing. We must become an intellectual, social, moral, and political power through a generous and permanent comradeship. We can do this only by public meetings, congresses, associations, and a Freethought press. We must use the same instrumentalities that are constantly used by the churches. They have their great gatherings, their synods, their councils, their conventions, and in this way the churches create an immense enthusiasm and exercise a more potent sway. These are human, practical, and far-reaching means, and Freethought must avail itself of such necessary aids.

All, therefore, are urged to come together at the National Congress of the American Secular Union and the Freethought Federation of America, to be held in New York, October 25th, 26th, and 27th, 1895.

It is hoped that there will be a large attendance, and that measures of co-operation, greater advance and usefulness will be adopted and cordially carried out by friends of freedom throughout the country.

The members of the American Secular Union are notified that such amendments to the Constitution will be proposed at the coming Congress as will enable the Union to consolidate with the Freethought Federation of America.

The members of the Freethought Federation are also notified that changes of the same nature will be proposed for its Constitution in order that it may unite as an organized body with the American Secular Union.

It is the general desire that there be one grand national organization adapted to all the needs of the present and future work. Without doubt this will be determined in a wise, conciliatory, and progressive spirit. Let us close our ranks and meet the common enemy, the bigots of the Christian church. We work for the future; we work for humanity; we work for the best interests of civilization, for the liberty and the progress of all. Let us stand bravely by our colors and unite in the common cause. There are vast and profound principles which should harmonize superficial differences. We have no creed to support, but always and everywhere the rights of man. This is the mighty battleground. Let us rally now as never before, with earnest convictions, courage, and enthusiasm. We cannot evade the issue, neither can the church itself. It is liberty or it is slavery. This is the conflict of the ages, and in the American Republic all that is most precious and ennobling is at stake.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM, President.

The Holy Relics of Aix-la-Chapelle.

We have frequently mentioned in these columns, says the San Francisco Argonaut, the bitter war which has long been waged between the towns of Treves and Argenteuil over their respective "Holy Coats." Both of these places claim to possess the garment worn by the savior of mankind at the time when he was about to be crucified—the same one, probably, which was cut up and divided among the Roman soldiery. Each town maintains that its "Holy Coat" is the only true and veritable garment, and that the other is a fraud. Each town yearly gathers in large quantities of the shekels of the faithful, who annually repair to the churches where in the sacred relics are preserved, for the purpose of curing themselves of all sorts of maladies. Active as is the quest of the priests of Treves and Argenteuil for the money of the pilgrims, their crusade against their rival is still more active.

But there comes a time once in seven years when they bury the hatchet, cease attacking one another, and join forces against a common enemy. This common enemy is the cathedral of Aix-la-Chapelle.

At Aix-la-Chapelle the relics are not only more numerous than those at either Treves or Argenteuil, but they are infinitely more powerful. At Aix-la-Chapelle, the priests not only possess a garment once worn by the savior, but one belonging to his mother as well. But let us make a list of these wonderful relics.

The "greater relics," so-called—there are a number of minor ones, but we shall not weary our readers with these—are thus set down in a reverent Continental journal, from which we take the particulars:

First—The white gown—or "shift," as the German word used might be delicately translated—which was worn by the Virgin at the time when her son, the savior, was born to her. It is five and a half feet long.

Second—The swaddling-clothes, of brown wool, in which the infant Jesus was wrapped. According to tradition, they were fashioned from a pair of old gaiters or leggings belonging to Saint Joseph, his mother's husband.

Third—The fine linen shroud, spotted with blood, in which were enveloped the remains of St. John the Baptist, after his head was cut off.

Fourth—The linen which was wrapped around the body of the savior during the crucifixion.

There are a number of other relics in the great cathedral of Aix-la-Chapelle, but in view of the size, the sanctity, and the healing power of those we have mentioned, they are not worth enumerating.

Once in seven years, during the month of July, the priests of the Cathedral of Aix-la-Chapelle exhibit these wonderful relics to the adoring gaze of the faithful. From all over Germany—nay, from all over Continental Europe—bands of pilgrims pour into the city of Aix-la-Chapelle. It goes without saying that the well ones are much edified, the sick ones are cured, and all leave large quantities of coin of various realms in the pious hands of the priests of the Cathedral of Aix-la-Chapelle. It is at this time that the priests of Treves and of Argenteuil, forgetting their quarrel over their "Holy Coats," join forces, and attack the authenticity of the holy relics of Aix-la-Chapelle.

But they have not succeeded. Whether it be that the faithful are grateful to the Cathedral Chapter of Aix-la-Chapelle for tapping them only once in seven years instead of once a twelvemonth—whether it be that the greater number of relics makes them more efficacious—or whether they are in reality more effectual in dermatology, which is the branch of medicine most needed in relic practice—the fact remains that the jealous fury of the priests of Treves and Argenteuil has not prevailed against the relics of Aix-la-Chapelle. For centuries the people have been coming there in enormous numbers, and a few weeks ago, when the relics were exercising their healing powers, the crowds were as great as they were during the Dark Ages—or in 1440, say, when, as history tells us, a roof broke down, killing scores of pilgrims.

In 1895, the roofs were crowded with pilgrims—just as they were in 1440, and probably with very much the same kind of people. The boast of the Roman church is that she is semper eadem—"always the same"—and judging from the intellectual caliber of the Roman Catholics who go to Treves, to Argenteuil, and Aix-la-Chapelle, very probably she boasts aright.

This year, as the respectful Continental journals describe and illustrate it by instantaneous photographs, the scene was "most impressive." Every morning at ten o'clock, a herald, in mediæval garb, appeared upon a stone gallery far up amid the flying buttresses of the ancient cathedral of Aix-la-Chapelle. Sounding a fanfare upon his herald's trumpet, he made proclamation as follows: "Hear ye! Hear ye! The faithful will now be permitted to gaze upon the smock of the holy virgin. Contemplate it respectfully for the sake of God and the glory of Mary, in order that she may intercede for you with her divine son," etc.

Then entered the clergy close upon his heels. There, high up in air, with grotesque stone gargoyles grinning at them, not unlike those on the towers of Notre Dame, the priests assembled. From the stone gallery, a crimson velvet tapestry was hung, and on this as a background there were suspended, one after another, the shift of the virgin Mary, the linen which wrapped the crucified one, the shroud of St. John the Baptist, and the swaddling-clothes of Christ. And as the lesser priests held these "holy relics" in place, over them there stood the bishop, with miter and crozier, and blessed the rabble of pilgrims, crowding the roofs and the streets far below. And around them, far up on the flying buttresses, the great stone gargoyles grinned, while below, in the infernal regions, doubtless the devil laughed.

When the "exposition of relics" is finished, there sweeps into the cathedral a vast crowd—leprous, ulcerated, lame, halt, and blind. To them the priests pretend to minister, and to the priests they give their offerings. As it was in the Dark Ages, so it is now.

For the events we are describing took place in the city of Aix-la-Chapelle, in the empire of Germany, in the month of July, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and ninety-five.

Verily, the boast of the Roman church is true—she is semper eadem—"always the same."

Our Missionary Work.

Several of our good friends have written us that in their opinion the work, "Self-Contradictions of the Bible," should go along with Paine's "Age of Reason" as a missionary pamphlet. Mr. J. R. Perry puts it thus: "As a missionary document the 144 Self-Contradictions will go hand in hand with the 'Age of Reason.' I think any person getting the one will get the other. It is the grubbing process, clearing out the roots and stones, necessary to preparing the soil for good seeds of common sense." And as it is our delight to furnish the implements for this sort of agricultural operations, we are willing to do our part and will send the "Self-Contradictions of the Bible" to those who will distribute it among their Christian friends, FOR A DOLLAR A DOZEN. Or we will send twelve copies to as many different addresses for one dollar.

Now let the friends of Freethought turn to and circulate "Self-Contradictions" as well as the "Age of Reason." Send both books out by the thousand and watch the result. Flood the country with them, and let the Christians know what their holy paper fetish, the Bible, is like and why it is worthless as a guide to any good.

THE TRUTH SEEKER's offer to send eight copies of Paine's "Age of Reason" to eight different addresses for $1, to be used for missionary purposes, is still open. The best results are reported from this method of reaching intelligent believers and giving a new direction to their thoughts.

There Are Too Many That Way.

News and Notes.

From Bognor, through the varying palaces of the moonlit night, I again return to London.

Sunday morning, September 1st, dawns with cloudless sky. I drift in the morning sunshine over to the home of Foote, and take my last smoke in the garden where happy hours have passed. I have dinner with Mr. and Mrs. George Ward, and meet our veteran comrade Tripp, of Brighton. In the afternoon I go to Finsbury Park, where Stanley Jones is wrestling with the Christians. He has a two hours' battle of it, but maintains the cause at every point. Stanley Jones is well equipped and has the energy and enthusiasm of a born reformer. He is one of the best workers in the field. I take tea with Mr. and Mrs. Fleming, and then we make our way to Foresters' hall, where I deliver my last lecture in England, "Ingersoll and Freethought," to a splendid audience—splendid in numbers, splendid in enthusiasm, splendid in its welcome to Mr. Foote as the representative of British Freethought, and to his co-worker from America. I must thank Mr. Foote for the thorough-going manner in which he has supported my labors in the field, and for his whole-souled greeting to me as a guest. He has been a comrade indeed, with chivalrous devotion to the cause. Success has been the result, as witnessed by this great and applauding gathering. Mr. Foote is a man full of resources. If one opportunity fails, he seizes another. He has recently made a vigorous movement upon the West End, at St. James's hall. Bradlaugh in his palmy days made no effort upon this side of London. The importance of Mr. Foote's new departure is now conceded, and he has won fresh laurels in this campaign. He has met new faces and enlarged the sphere of Secular work, while abandoning no post. I believe the Freethought forces in London were never in better condition for advance, under this brave and cautious leader. I am sure that the series of lectures at Foresters' hall will be a pronounced success. The enthusiastic conclusion of my own labors marks the beginning of a victorious winter's campaign. Mr. Watts lectures the next two Sundays, and he is a favorite with London audiences, as elsewhere, and always draws the full quota of our columns. I must thank him also for his unstinted aid. He arranged the whole course of my lectures in such a way that I could do the most work and see the best of the country. I could not have accomplished nearly as much without his cheerful assistance. I can only hope to repay the generosity of my British comrades when they come to see the grandeur and magnificence of America. Of course, while I admire the old country, with its vast accumulations of knowledge and art, I must still affirm that America beats the world, for in it is the immeasurable promise of the future. We may not have done much yet, but think of the mighty theater, with mountains, rivers, lakes, and plains, in which millions of the human race will develop. Well, Foote and Watts must come to our shores, and I will show them a thing or two when they arrive. They shall have a warm welcome, and they shall be assured that the Freethinkers of America appreciate the work they have done as the representatives of our British brethren; and through them we will join heart and hand with all transatlantic comrades.

Monday, August 26th, was also a day of pleasure, for I visited the far-famed Windsor Castle with Mr. Victor Jackson and the secretaries of the National Secular Society and the London Federation, Miss Edith M. Vance and Miss Annie Brown. The secretaries were formerly residents of Windsor; Miss Brown's father for nearly half a century has been employed in Windsor Castle itself, and so with these friends I had plenty of chance to see the glory of this magnificent structure, the largest royal residence in the world. I do not know whether we could have a Windsor Castle without royalty or not, but it is certainly a precious gift to the present generation, and may it endure when democracy shall triumph. Kings and queens have flourished here, and their day is gone; but not with them shall vanish the splendor of this imposing edifice. I cannot describe all I saw; I can only give glimpses. Of course I climbed the Round Tower, and was repaid for the somewhat difficult journey up the winding staircase. It was a memorable view that greeted the eye—the river Thames winding along, Eaton College, the great forests, the deer and cattle, the vast fields, the city itself at my feet; the castle with its walls and turrets, its moat, its gateways, its pavilions and chapels, its assemblage of massy halls and chambers. Before me lay the accumulated result of the toils of many kings. It was a bright and beautiful picture, for little of tragedy is connected with Windsor Castle, "The muses' and the monarch's seat." It reminds one of gorgeous revelry, of the brightness and not the darkness of the past. After the tower we were guided into the State apartments, the Vandyck room, the Zuccarelli room, the Ante-room, the Grand vestibule, the Waterloo chamber, St. George's hall, the Guard chamber, and so forth. The paintings, statues, porcelains, curiosities that I looked upon, I cannot enumerate. It was a vast display, and I don't see that the queen can own it any more than the rest of us, for we certainly could enjoy all its beauty and draw lessons from its historic associations, its wonders of human ingenuity and power.

After we had visited the castle, and enjoyed an excellent repast purveyed by our good friend Victor Jackson, the same generous comrade secured a "trap," and we had a drive through the great park and to Runnymede. The "long walk," I believe, surpasses the world for grace and ornamentation. It is straight as an arrow for three miles—direct from the royal entrance of Windsor to the statue of George the Fourth. On either side are wide ranks of trees, and beyond these are open spaces of green fields, which, again, are hedged in by ampler forests. As we ascend towards the statue, the scenery broadens. Forest on forest appears; fields are added to fields; farther on are smooth pastures flecked with wandering herds, while the majestic castle, illumined by the setting sun, crowns the landscape with superb form. With soft, grassy banks, and bosom rippled by passing boats, the river flashes on our sight. The fair meadows of Runnymede stretch away where the shafts of sunset seem to glimmer on the armor of old barons. Quaint houses edge the road, with ivied walls and rose-embowered windows. Green hedges slip by us as we near the lighted streets, and the horse, spurred by thoughts of supper and guided by a skillful hand, gets on an extra move. It was a time when I could see Herne the hunter, and Falstaff, and the merry wives of Windsor, the oak in the moonlight with the fairies dancing about it, and the many-colored lanterns. Windsor is not simply the home of royalty. It is a palace of poetry, and its surroundings are replete with legend and romance. I must thank my friends for this day. Windsor Castle will not be forgotten, nor the companions associated with its entrancing scenes.

Tuesday is another day of notable experience. I visit Epping forest and its vicinity, the greatest play-ground in the world, where for miles one may wander in sylvan solitudes. This forest is now preserved for the pleasure of the people. For centuries it was encroached upon by avaricious landlords, but, by act of parliament, hereafter its "contiguity of shade" will be untouched, and millions can roam in its bowers and drink the pure air of heaven—especially on Sundays. Such is the march of the people.

Forder takes me out, and we land at Aybridge, Essex. Mr. Moody meets us at the station and takes us to White Hart hotel, of which he is proprietor. We have a delightful welcome from both Mr. and Mrs. Moody, who are Freethinkers, and together we take a drive to King's Head, at Chigwell. This is an antique place, celebrated by Charles Dickens in "Barnaby Rudge" as the Maypole. Of it the novelist says: "Such a delicious old inn, opposite the churchyard; such an out-of-the-way, rural place." It is to-day just as Dickens described it in "Barnaby Rudge." He lived here himself when he wrote that great book. It is said that Queen Elizabeth lodged here. No one knows when it was built, but scarcely any change has overtaken the place in its structure. The walls, the rooms, the window-panes, are the same. It is a place for dim, sweet memories. The garden is especially lovely. It has all sorts of little nooks, bowers, flower-beds, and grassy plots. No wonder Dickens loved this place and fostered his genius with its exquisite surroundings. It is now kept by Tucker Bros., who warmly welcomed the Secular Pilgrim, having themselves been denizens of America. If within twelve miles of London one wishes to see real old English buildings and rural life, and enjoy the luxury of untroubled quietude, he must find his way to King's Head, Chigwell. It was to me a poetic revelation of the "things that were."

White Hart hotel is also an attractive caravansary. Mine host Moody is a provider of all good things, and believes in one world at a time. This is a favorite haunt of those who hunt and fish, and the little village is at times as crowded as the thoroughfares of London. My day at Aybridge was one of especial entertainment.

And now time rolls on to the farewell banquet. The Holborn is one of the most famous restaurants in London. It is a bright, handsome, cheery place. It has an air both of elegance and comfort. At the hour of dinner, music fills its spacious halls. Flowers are seen on every side with tropical luxuriance. In the Holborn you have the "golden mean," art and beauty without depressing pomp or the restraint of rigid upholstery. No wonder that reformers love to congregate here, for they can have the good things of life, with brilliant surroundings, in a free-and-easy fashion. I hate some hotels. It seems a sacrifice of radical principle to enter their stiff and stately corridors. But the Holborn has a broad and wholesome look, inviting to the iconoclast while he admires the beautiful.

So we gather here, and it was one of the happiest occasions of my life. The friends are numerous and widely representative of Freethought in England. George W. Foote presides over the festivities, with the Pilgrim on his right and the redoubtable Watts on his left. George Anderson, George Jacob Holyoake, Parris, Forder, Ward, Wheeler, Moss, Rowney, Mr. Gimson of Leicester, Mr. Gillespie of Newcastle, Mr. Tripp of Brighton, C. A. Watts, Edward Truelove, Mr. Heaford, and Victor Jackson are among those who brighten the circle. The ladies who grace the banquet are Mrs. Foote, Mrs. Watts, Miss Jessie Nowlan, Mrs. Charles A. Watts, Miss Vance, Miss Annie Brown, Mrs. Ward, Miss Robbins, Mrs. Heaford, and Mrs. Wheeler. Mr. and Mrs. Sumner are present and Mr. and Mrs. Moody of Aybridge. I cannot enumerate the whole because the names shine along somewhere toward a hundred, good and true friends, who link England and America in glorious comradeship. From time immemorial eating together has been the symbol of companionship, a very sensible, solid materialistic, and humanitarian custom which will no doubt endure as long as man has a good appetite and a generous heart. We did full justice to the ancient and honorable regime, and the Holborn certainly did its part in the hospitable program with triumphant felicity, while we did the rest. However, we did not consume in silence. The play of fancy mingled with the satisfaction of the material frame. Then came the after-dinner speeches, upon whose sacred altar Mr. Foote offered himself as the first victim. No one could do it more gracefully, or with more genial effect. He brought us at once into the glow of fellowship by his eloquence and humor. He did not clothe the occasion with melancholy. He looked upon the bright side of the farewell hour. "We are simply going to different fields of labor," he said, "and the same flag floats over us all." Then was drank the health of the representative of American Freethought. This was responded to first of all by George Jacob Holyoake, who spoke good words for American Freethought, of Ingersoll and his coadjutors, whose work is followed with interest throughout Great Britain. Mr. Holyoake referred to the letters of the Pilgrim, which he declared displayed a luminous knowledge of the fields of labor through which he had passed. I was glad to find that I had hit the mark and was on the whole a correct observer, for I considered it of the first importance to give a veritable picture of these British Isles. Mr. Holyoake was followed by Mr. Gimson and Mr. Parris, whose words were indeed pleasant for me to listen to, and then came Watts, who is always good, and on this occasion especially so, for he spoke out of the experiences of many years and many places. We had been together both in England and America, side by side with Ingersoll, with Bennett, with Macdonald, in the New World, and now with Foote and all our brave allies in the Old. Mr. Watts touched the deepest chords of the occasion and voiced its noblest meaning, and made a fitting and inspiring close to the splendid words which had been spoken in sympathy with the kindred people of America. I made response with heartfelt utterance to these fraternal greetings, and in behalf of America spoke the message of progress and universal brotherhood. "We need these occasions," I said, "in order to rejoice in hope and courage. We cannot work alone. We must work together. Liberty, science, and humanity are the words that blaze on our banners, and above is the noble motto of Paine, 'The world is my country.'"

The speeches were followed by a recitation from Mrs. Charles Watts, whose humorous descriptions of mankind and elevation of woman were received with many plaudits. We were delighted that the "weaker sex" had such a brilliant representative who was able to hold her own with such sparkling wit, and thus added to the eclat of the banquet. Then music filled the air, and merry songs made glad the heart. Mr. George Anderson afterwards gave one of the best speeches of the evening. Mr. Anderson seldom speaks; he does the work; but when he does speak it is to the point. He referred to the arduous labors of Mr. Foote; the many difficulties that beset him; the magnanimous spirit in which he had met them; the bold methods to which he had resorted, and the success he had attained. He spoke of the necessity of standing loyally by Mr. Foote, in order that there might be unity and concentration in the Freethought ranks and victory for the cause. He proposed the health of President Foot, which was drunk with ringing applause. Mr. Foot eloquently answered, affirming that he did not claim to be infallible, but that he did the best he could, and would continue to do so. He did not ask support for his individual opinions, but for the measures devised as chief of the party whose sole purpose was the advancement of the cause. In these we must combine. The response given to Mr. Foot shows that he has the entire confidence of the party; that the heart of Freethought Britain is with him, and with Mr. Watts, Mr. Anderson, and hundreds of unflinching supporters, he will push forward the lines to assured victory.

We close with singing "Auld Lang Syne." I can sing that song myself, and therefore it was a unanimous melody. Everybody takes a hand in it, as well as a note. I join hands with Anderson on the final stanza, and this stanza is given with a vim that the bards of Scotland cannot surpass. What visions of the past, what glories of the future, are in this beautiful song, whose music is heard the world over, beside a thousand camp-fires and hearthstones; on mountain, plain, and sea; in cottage and palace. After the song we still linger. This is the last time I shall see many friends. We shake hands and say good-bye. We know not what is before us, but we have a heart for any fate. It's no use to repine or trust in providence. We trust in ourselves and hope for good fortune. There may be sundering oceans, but humanity bridges them all. The heart of man is mightier than time or space.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Important—Which Way?

In his great lecture, "Which Way?" Colonel Ingersoll gives a commanding view of history and the two ways by which humanity has traveled—the "narrow way" and the "broad way," the way of theology and the way of freedom and science. He gives a picture of human development which is wonderfully instructive and kindles hope for the future. But the glory of to-day has been won only by toil, self-sacrifice, and martyrdom; and the glory of the future can be accomplished only in the same way. One of the most important points made by Ingersoll is concerning the two different methods of government, theological and secular—government by priests and government by the people. Gradually, amidst tremendous conflicts, the government by the people has triumphed. The theological government, however, is still strong, and the question in our Republic, "Which way?" is by no means decided. It is for the American people to choose, and choose they must. From present indications it looks as if the old-fashioned, cruel, barbarous, theological way would be adopted. The Liberals must meet this issue and effectually settle it. If they arouse themselves they can choose the way of this Republic, the way of freedom, of science, and of humanity. "Which way?" is a far-reaching question, and the eloquence of Ingersoll is a trumpet blast to those who realize the necessity of continued effort.

The great Freethinkers' Congress this month will emphasize the supreme question. It is important to sustain this Congress. We need the means for work and success. Do not fail to forward contributions. If each friend will do his share, all is well. In addition to the generous contributions reported last week I have the pleasure of recording the following:

A Victory for Justice.

THE TRUTH SEEKER some weeks ago gave an extended account of the efforts made by a few Freethinkers of Augusta, Illinois, to secure the equitable taxation of the parsonages of the Christian and Methodist Episcopal churches in that town, illegally exempted by the assessor and board of supervisors. The attorney-general and state auditor had decided that the buildings should be taxed under the law. What follows is the sequel to the story as told before:

PETITION FROM AUGUSTA TOWNSHIP.

To the Honorable Board of Supervisors of Hancock County: Your petitioners respectfully show unto your honorable body, that they petitioned your honorable body at your last meeting to assess lot eight (8) in block two (2) in Abernethy's second addition to the village of Augusta in said county, and lot two (2) of the out-lots recorded by Joseph Weinberg to said village of Augusta, reference being hereby had to said petition; that your honorable body neither granted nor refused the prayer of said petition, but ordered that hereafter all church property in the said county be listed for taxes except the buildings used strictly for public worship; that your petitioner, F. L. Chambers, presented this matter to Hon. M. T. Malony, attorney-general of this state, and received a letter from said attorney-general in reference thereto, a copy of which is hereto attached and made a part of this petition [Attorney-General Maloney's letter appeared in our former presentation of the case]; that the assessor of Augusta township upon being shown said letter promptly assessed said property and forwarded his assessment thereof to county clerk; that your petitioner has received a letter from said county clerk, a copy of which is hereto attached, informing your petitioner, F. L. Chambers, that the matter will be referred to the state's attorney and your honorable body.

Your petitioners further show unto your honorable body that they are residents and taxpayers of Augusta township and that they respectfully petition your honorable body to take direct and positive action upon this matter, and assess said property according to law.

Dated this 4th day of September, 1895.

F. L. CHAMBERS,
WILLIAM GOLM.

CARTHAGE, ILL., Aug. 24, 1895.

F. L. CHAMBERS, ESQ., Augusta, Ill., Dear Sir: The assessment of the M. E. and Christian parsonages of Augusta received. M. E. parsonage valued at $300, Christian at $200. I have not made the entry on the assessors' books yet, but have referred the matter to our state's attorney and will also call the attention of the board of supervisors to the same, at the September meeting.

Yours truly,
E. McCLURE,
Clerk Board of Supervisors.

On motion of Mr. Bush, said petition was referred to the committee on equalization, and the clerk read the report of the committee on equalization on the assessment of certain church property in the village of Augusta, which is as follows:

To the Hon. Chairman and Board of Supervisors: We, your committee on equalization to whom was referred the assessment of certain church parsonages in the village of Augusta, namely, lot 8 block 2 in Abernethy's second addition to the village of Augusta in said county and out-lot 2 of out-lots recorded by Joseph Weinberg to said village of Augusta, beg leave to report that after due consideration we recommend that the county clerk be authorized to extend taxes on said property as returned by the local assessor.

GEO. W. FRAZER, Chairman.

Mr. J. F. Crawford moved that the above be amended by the insertion of the word "not" before the word "authorized." Motion lost.

Mr. Sanderson moved that the report be received and adopted. Motion lost.

Mr. Crawford moved that the report of the committee be laid on the table. Motion lost.

DEAR SIR: The assessment of the M. E. and Christian parsonages of Augusta has been placed on the collector's book and the tax will be extended on the same.

Yours respectfully,
E. McCLURE, Clerk.

This is a splendid victory, because the battle was one for the secular principle and was won by the wise and determined fighting of two or three men in the face of much opposition and against the strong force of local public sentiment. The example of our comrades Chambers and Golm should encourage Liberals everywhere to demand justice.

Religious Fervor or Emotional Insanity?

It is a long time since there has been witnessed in this country such an extraordinary display of religious emotionalism (if, indeed, there was any religion in it) as that at the Old Orchard camp-meeting ground down in Maine last Sunday morning. Such an outbreak of religious frenzy would not be surprising among the ignorant, superstitious, and excitable Negro population of the South, but that it should occur in a staid, intelligent, and conservative New England community almost justifies the inquiry, "Is civilization played out?"

It appears that a Christian Alliance revivalist, Rev. A. H. Simpson, has been conducting a series of revival meetings on the famous old campground. The attendance last Sunday was unusually large, and the appeals of the preacher in behalf of mission work were so impassioned and effective that, when contributions were called for, Simpson was literally overwhelmed with offerings. The audience was so inflamed by the preacher's zeal and earnestness that it became frenzied. A description of the remarkable scene says that the sermon was interrupted by the handing in of checks and money, and at its conclusion Rev. Mr. Holden, of Texas, went forward and laid upon the platform a deed of his entire property, consisting of land in California worth $10,000, and which, he said, ought to bring $7,500 at a forced sale. Mrs. Holden joined in the gift, which swept away the couple's home and all they had saved, and, amid the excitement caused by the remarkable sacrifice, Dr. Simpson shouted, "Believe and let go!" They did let go. Mrs. Mary D. Perkins, of Boston, pledged some property which she thought ought to bring $4,500; Mrs. S. M. Ely, of St. Louis, sent forward a note for $500, the proceeds of the sale of her diamonds, and tenders of various sums followed in quick succession, and in many instances simultaneously. Louise Shepard, the vocalist, tore her diamonds from her ears and sent them to the platform, and, emulating her example, other women divested themselves of their diamonds and precious metal jewelry, and sent it to Dr. Simpson by the hatful. One man contributed $1,000, accompanied with a note that he hadn't a dollar left. Profiting by an appeal once successfully made by Frederick the Great, Miss Shepard said that she would meet those who wanted to "exchange gold for iron for Jesus' sake," and during the recess which followed she was kept busy giving iron watches for gold watches and iron crosses for jewelry. In all, 36 gold repeaters were exchanged for iron watches and valuable jewels were surrendered for iron crosses. The latter and the iron watches bore the inscription, "Gold for iron for Jesus' sake." As the report reads, "one woman, with a patient face, and poorly dressed, came up and passed out a gold watch that was evidently of old-fashioned make, probably her one valuable bit of jewelry. She looked at it for the last time, shed tears she could not keep back, and then gave it to Miss Shepard, saying, 'for the sake of Christ, I wish I could do more.'" When the gift-giving, which aggregated $75,000 in money and pledges, had ceased, Dr. Simpson said that, so far, men and women had given up only their earthly possessions, and he inquired, "How many of you will give your lives for Christ? How many of you are ready to be sent to the mission fields in Africa?" One after another announced "I will go," until forty had responded.

Every reader must judge for himself whether all this was a manifestation of religious fervor or of emotional frenzy. There are no doubt people with an old-fashioned sense of propriety and honesty who will insist that the people who gave all their possessions in a moment of frenzy should have their gifts returned to them. Such persons will say that sane people do not give away the savings of their lives, the means of saving themselves from dependence and pauperism, and leave themselves naked and helpless to the world. They will say that no matter whether those Old Orchard donors were hypnotized, narcotized, terrorized, ecstaticized, or fanaticized it is clear they were sufficiently demoralized to entitle them to protection from the consequences of a temporary frenzy. Indeed, if the revivalist is himself a man of honor, he will voluntarily return those contributions and refuse to take anything from them until they shall have returned to their normal condition. If he will not do it voluntarily the authorities at Old Orchard should compel him to do so.

No one will question the right of sane and responsible persons to contribute liberally to the Christianization of the heathen of Africa and the Orient, however some may doubt the wisdom of such efforts. But assuredly there are poverty and heathenism enough at home demanding the prayers, preachments, and philanthropies of the charitable and the good. If missionaries are needed anywhere in this wide and wicked world, they are needed at this very time in Tennessee, where certain good Christians have decided that the religious doctrines held by the Seventh-Day Adventists are wrong, particularly that feature of their creed that recognizes the injunction of the Bible to rest on the seventh day. In spite of their predilections in the way of moonshine whisky and killing revenue officers and duelling and perpetuating bloody family feuds, the people of Tennessee are as pious and ready to fall into religious frenzies as the people of Old Orchard. A number of excellent Christians have been indicted and put in the chain gang to work on the public roads for reserving the right to observe Saturday as their day of rest—the Sabbath prescribed by the Bible. Divested of its legal flummery the sole charge upon which they have been sentenced to ignominious labor as criminals is that their religious belief differs from that of their neighbors. So long as such outrages can be perpetrated in this country in the name of the Christian Sabbath it is ridiculous to spend money and sacrifice lives in converting the Confucians of China and the Buddhists of India to Christianity. There could be no greater absurdity than sending missionaries to China while we have a whole state full of heathens in our own land who persecute and torture their fellow beings for a quibbling and inconsequent difference in religious belief, to say nothing of the swarms of other heathen in the slums of New York, Boston, Chicago, and every other large city in this "Christian land."—Minneapolis Times.

The American Protective Association are endeavoring to have the Papal Alegate banished by legislative enactment. If the Yankees were true freemen and upholders of their independence, they would simply laugh at any man who, dressed up as a clown, pretended to be the agent of an almighty deity.—Secular Thought.

Observations.

A contributor to Lucifer, discussing the matter of dress, observes: "We are slowly advancing, and it may be that Christian nations will in the remote future become as civilized as Japan." The Kansas people may be able to see further into the forward vista than those of the East, but to us here the thought of such a possibility would be regarded as an apocalyptic vision of extreme wildness. The tendency is in the opposite direction. It is true that none of the political parties has taken up the matter, but the Republican plank dealing with the interests of morality is known to be a stab in the general direction. Meanwhile the cry of the pulpit is, "Down with bloomers," and the wearers of those articles of dress are strengthening their suspenders in anticipation of a decisive assault. It is well to be reasonably hopeful, but exaggerated enthusiasm may do more harm than good.

Among the new stories that Chauncey M. Depew brings back from Europe is an account of his visit to the holy gulch in the foothills of the Pyrenees called the Grotto of the Virgin at Lourdes. He saw there, he says, a young woman who, according to the statement of the promoters who exhibited her, was lately afflicted with twenty-eight—or was it one hundred and twenty-eight?—"running sores" on her leg. Having importuned the Virgin and been dipped in the creek, a cure is alleged to have resulted, and she was the star miracle of grace when Chauncey struck the camp. Of course he had to see her. She repeated her lines as she had been taught to do; the attendants parroted their parts, and then the limb was liberally displayed. The spectator testifies that he could detect discolorations of the flesh, as though there might once have been boils on it; but then, having said thus much in the interest of popular delusion, he adds: "I did not see the girl before the cure." That is the fatal defect of all miraculous cures. We do not know the patients before and after taking. If there is anything the matter with them they are not cured; and if they are cured, there is always a hopeless lack of evidence that anything ever was the matter with them. This broad general remark explains all the particular cases of healing by faith.

A citizen of Italy, though in the enjoyment of connubial advantages, might be excused for saying he does not know whether he is really married or not. The Catholic church forbids its members to enter into matrimony through the civil gateway, and holds that all relations under state sanction are illicit. The state, in retaliation, denounces religious marriage as "concubinage." Civil officers who perform the ceremony are anathematized by the pope, and if a bill now before Parliament is passed, all priests who celebrate marriages before the civil ceremony has taken place will be prosecuted by the government. In a scrap of this kind, between rival candidates for a position which is in all respects a sinecure, it cannot be easy for the people to decide offhand which ought to win, if either, or whether a compromise is the more desirable. It would, however, be plainly to the advantage of both priest and politician to make the fight a short one. For if those coupled by the church become convinced from experience that the sanction of the state is superfluous; if those joined by the state arrive at the same conclusion as regards the offices of the church, and if then the church-coupled and state-joined compare notes and learn that neither have lost anything through the absence of secular sanction on the one hand and church sanction on the other, they are likely to discover between them that both altar and throne have been getting an unearned increment which may as well be shut off. Then there would be the devil to pay, with no parson or squire to heat the pitch.

A medium named Batdorf, of Grand Rapids, Mich., it is learned, has been arrested for using the mails for alleged fraudulent purposes. I presume that Mr. Batdorf is one of those persons who profess ability to cure disease by correspondence, or to foretell the future, to magnetize paper or slates or planchets, or to impart mediumistic powers—none of which things it is likely that he can do, though he may honestly think that he does them all. His prosecution raises the question whether it is legitimate for the shrewd to profit by the credulity of the foolish. If it is not, it seems to me that a good many persons will have to change their occupations. Under the universal application of such a rule—if all must demonstrate the value of their services before receiving pay for them—how would our politicians live? Even the gentlemen who framed and voted for the law to suppress spirit mediums might find themselves open to an engagement. And then how about the priests and ministers who, under the pretense of insuring you a joyful welcome in a district not reached by any postal system, accept an honorarium for prayers and blessings, for masses and sermons, for the exposition of alleged relics, and for other services of no appreciable value? They even profess to sanctify marriage unions which to all intents and purposes are bargains and sales of the person, and a fraudulent use of both males and females. These are permitted to conduct their bogus trade, I apprehend, on the principle that a fool and his money are soon parted, and there is no help for him. The mediumistic craft is comparatively modern, and the law is designed to protect those who are not yet on to its curvatures and sinuosities; but the church, on the other hand, is such an old stand-by fraud that even the farmers from Wayback, who don't read the papers, have no excuse for being taken in by it. I see no other reason than this for the discrimination between such mediums as are fraudulent and all ministers.

The adherents of the doctrine of design, the believers in the purposefulness of creation, have not as yet been utterly routed and driven from their strongholds by the advocates of evolution. Among the evidence relied on by the evolutionists to confute their opponents, the so-called teleologists, is that of the rudimentary organs—those parts in human bodies which really have no function, and yet exist in form. They point to our useless muscles, such as those which in the lower animals are employed in whisking the ears or twitching the skin, or to the little fold in the corner of the eye, which is all that remains of the nictitating membrane, or third eyelid, observable in other animals and in birds; and they ask the teleologists why we have these if we were created perfect. The evolutionary theory is that such organs, inherited from our brute ancestors, are bound to disappear when they are no longer of use, and that those mentioned are now on their way toward extinction. But an acceptor of the design argument bares his manly bosom, and, calling our attention to the visible remnant of a mammary system, inquires why it continues to exist, unchanged since the Pliocene epoch, if useless organs always tend to disappear. And the evolutionist cannot say a word in reply; for if this apparatus is not useful in the male organism, beast or human, then, according to the evolutionary doctrine, it ought not at present to be there.

Evidently neither the evolutionists nor the "purposefulists" have looked at this thing at long range, casting a prophetic eye over the future developments of the race and individuals. It is altogether too early yet for conclusions, but the rapid advance of the female sex, and a noticeable tendency toward effeminacy in the other—here the New Woman and there the Dude—ought to suggest something to the thoughtful. It is boldly argued by scientific persons—Mrs. E. D. Slenker, for example—that woman is really the superior sex; and of course, if that is so, it is only a question of time when she will assume the supremacy and man will be reduced to the subordinate position now occupied by her. Naturally, also, there will be an exchange of duties. The superior being is not likely to sit in the house while the other one attends to business in an inferior manner. And if this reversal of duties occurs, it follows as a matter of logic that the active partner of the concern is not going to be hampered with the care of infants. Any man can see how it would cripple him if he had to nurse children while engaged in business pursuits, and it could not be otherwise with a woman. We see a great many strange things in this universe which a facetious creator has provided for our amusement, and it is quite conceivable that the authority with which he has dressed the male sex is only temporary. Peradventure, then, the parts that in our ignorance we regard as without function are only dormant, that is, taking a rest. When we contemplate the extent to which woman has within the past few years usurped the places wherein man was thought to be secure, and when we consider the efficiency with which she now does the work that formerly only a man could do, we naturally cast about us for a corresponding invasion of the domain of woman by the opposite sex. Somebody must fill the corset she leaves vacant; and the question is whether the circumstances here discussed indicate with any certainty who it will be or how well the necessities of the case will be met. Gynæcomasty, which is necessary to a perfectly satisfactory performance of the office aforesaid, is not altogether unknown at present, and it may have been common to Eocene man. A recrudescence of it is certainly among imaginable events, and if it occurs the teleologist's goose is cooked—he is downed for keeps; while the scientific doctrine of Adaptation, the causal and mechanical view of living nature, will be placed on a firm foundation. GEO. E. MACDONALD.

Archbishop Corrigan's Miracle-Joint.

Colonel Ingersoll lectured in Columbia theater, Brooklyn, last Sunday evening to a large audience. His address was entitled "Which Way?" If the New York Press is to be believed, "he went out of his way to make personal attacks," but when it is known that the passages complained of are embodied in the lecture as printed in pamphlet form, the statement of the Press loses some of its force. Here is what Colonel Ingersoll said that stirred up the faithful:

"At the present time, in the city of New York, Catholic priests are exhibiting a piece of one of the bones of St. Anne, the supposed mother of the Virgin Mary. Some of these priests may be credulous imbeciles, and some may be pious rogues. If they have any real intelligence they must know that there is no possible way of proving that the piece of bone ever belonged to St. Anne. And if they have any real intelligence they must know that even the bones of St. Anne were substantially like the bones of other persons, made of substantially the same material, and that the medical and miraculous qualities of all human bones must be substantially the same. And yet these priests are obtaining from their credulous dupes thousands and thousands of dollars for the privilege of seeing this bone and kissing the box that contains the 'sacred relic.'

"Archbishop Corrigan knows that no one knows who the mother of the Virgin Mary was; that no one knows about any of the bones of this unknown mother; he knows that the whole thing is a theological fraud; knows that his priests, or priests under his jurisdiction, are obtaining money under false pretenses.

"Cardinal Gibbons knows the same, but neither of these pious gentlemen has one word to say against the shameless crime.

"They are willing that priests, for the benefit of the church, should make merchandise of the hopes and fears of ignorant believers; willing that fraud, that produces revenue, should live and thrive.

"This is the honesty of the theologian. If either of these gentlemen should be taken sick, he would not touch the relic; he would send for a physician."

Lectures and Meetings.

THE Newark Liberal League will resume its meetings the first Sunday in October (to-morrow), at 177 Halsey st., corner of Market. Addresses by T. M. Fuller, formerly an orthodox clergyman, as follows: At 8 o'clock p.m., "The Universal Law of Prayer." At 8 o'clock, "Was the Human Race Ever Lost?" Mr. S. P. Putnam lectures before the Newark League Oct. 20th.

JAMES E. LARMER, JR., of 119 Poplar st., New Haven, Conn., is to make a lecturing tour across the continent, opening at Newark, N. J. Thence he goes through Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Illinois, and westward to California. His subjects are "Facts about the Bible," and "The Rise and Decline of Christianity." Mr. Larmer will attend the Convention in New York, Oct. 25th, 26th, and 27th.

THE Friendship Liberal League, George Longford, secretary, meets at 7:30, every Sunday evening in Warner's Hall, Broad and Wallace streets, Philadelphia. Oct. 13, 2:30 p.m., "The Sunday Question." Franklin Steiner. At 7:30, "Jesus Christ as a Guide for Humanity." Franklin Steiner.

Letters of Friends.

The Procession is Unbroken.

CHERRY VALLEY, WASH., Sept. 9, 1895.
MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $3 for THE TRUTH SEEKER and "Pictorial Text-Book."
Geo. B. KITTLE.

LIMA, O., Sept. 16, 1895.

MR. EDITOR: I herewith inclose $5.50 for "Short History of the Bible," "Pictorial Text-Book," and THE TRUTH SEEKER for one year.
ALFRED A. CREPS.

The Work Will Go On.

MARCO, FLA., Sept. 11, 1895.
MR. EDITOR: I inclose renewal of my subscription for one year. I am much pleased with it. May you continue the good work you have begun. Wishing you every success, Yours, etc., WM. BROWN.

After Years of Waiting.

CANASTOTA, N. Y., Sept. 16, 1895.
MR. EDITOR: After over two years' impatience I am able to send for "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," and add one more year's subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. My subscription is overdue, but I waited so as to send for the book and paper together. Yours for truth,
MRS. ROSELLA L. STISSER.

Of Course He is Pleased.

NORTH AMHERST, O., Sept. 9, 1895.
MR. EDITOR: The "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book" and the first number of THE TRUTH SEEKER duly to hand, and many thanks. I am more than delighted with the book—it should be in the hands of every Freethinker in the country. I am going to use my influence here in its behalf. Inclosed please find a small order.
Yours truly, ALEXANDER C. KERR.

A Tribute to D. M. Bennett.

CONTINENTAL, O., Sept. 13, 1895.
MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $1, for which please send me "Christian Questions and Arguments Answered." I want them for distribution among some of my Christian friends. I consider it the most convincing and conclusiv thing I have yet seen in Liberal literature. The copy that I got of you a short time ago, among some other pamphlets, is going the rounds, but I want some more.
A. JACKSON.

The Intrinsic Greater than the Exchange Value.

CITY OF MEXICO, Sept. 6, 1895.
MR. EDITOR: THE TRUTH SEEKER came regularly to me while I was in Oaxaca, also "Pope's" and "Pictorial Text-Book," all of which have given me much satisfaction. If the price for the books were equal to their intrinsic value, I would still owe you a small fortune.

Herewith I inclose $6. Please do me the favor to square the old account, and send to my new address books named herein. If there should be any money left, please place it to the Wise Fund.

Very sincerely, A. J. RIGBY.

We Wish You Victory.

CORSICANA, TEX., Sept. 15, 1895.
MR. EDITOR: Please credit inclosure on my subscription account. I am behind time, I know, but having been besieged so long by a formidable enemy, poverty, I am compelled to struggle and learn better tactics to conquer hereafter. I am now in a good way to assault his fort and make him pay the interest owed me for the last four years. I shall divide and send you soon a slice of the spoils in order not to feel as bad as I do when threatened with the discontinuance of your paper, without which I would get the blues.

We are muzzled everywhere on Sunday now, except in France, where, if you have money to spend, you are at liberty to do so.
PAUL COFFEY.

For Defense and Propaganda.

CAPLINGER'S MILLS, MO., Sept. 13, 1895.
MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $3—$1 for the J. B. Wise Fund, $1 for the Fleckten school case, and for the remaining dollar you may send me eight copies of "Age of Reason," as I think I can use that number to good advantage in this benighted region. The wind-peddlers have been with us for the past two or three weeks, adding fuel to the flames of hell and branding infidelity as denying God, Bible, and everything that is just and good. Infidels know, and all the Christians I have heard express themselves believe, that what was said, or the greater portion, at least, was gross superstition and misleading, and as a result some of them (Christians) have expressed a desire to investigate the subject for themselves and ask me to get them a copy of our bible (the "Age of Reason").

Yours for truth, W. A. WHINREY.

We'll Greet You Again in '96.

WARREN, O., Sept. 16, 1895.
MR. EDITOR: I send you herewith my renewal for THE TRUTH SEEKER. This will very possibly be my last remittance, as I am now in my eighty-fourth year, and the mile-stones of life must in the nature of things be nearly all passed. I cannot say, however, that life has not been worth living. I have tried to live not for myself alone. I have found the roses and thorns growing upon the same bush, and be it fate or be it what it may, I have tried to do my duty as I saw it, regardless of consequences or destiny.

We are never dead sure we are right unless we believe those who are opposed to us all wrong. I still believe more confidently than ever that our orthodox friends, the enemy, are all wrong.

Wishing you success and prosperity, I remain, Yours, THOMAS DOUGLASS.

Additional Facts about Jeremiah Hacker.

BARRE, MASS., Sept. 19, 1895.
MR. EDITOR: I was surprised that no mention was made in the mortuary notice of Mr. Hacker that he and his wife up to the time of her death—six years ago—for several years had received regularly each month $20 from that grand, good man, Photius Fisk, and after her death he was paid $10 a month until Mr. Fisk's death in 1891. I am greatly surprised if Mr. Fisk did not leave an annuity of $120 to Mr. Hacker during his life.

Another important omission—Mr. Hacker, for forty years, was too hard of hearing to engage in common conversation. When I lectured in Portland, Maine, in 1858, he called to see me and was so deaf I could converse with him only through some of his friends. I never knew he was restored to his hearing. I feel it due him and his friends that these facts should be noted in connection with his demise.

ELLA E. GIBSON.

A Live Liberal in a Live City.

MINNEAPOLIS, Sept. 17, 1895.
MR. EDITOR: I read the denial from Mr. Haguwood of High Shoals, Ga., in THE TRUTH SEEKER. Here is another denial that appeared in the Minneapolis Times, which I secured from the postmaster at Athens, Ga.:

Readers of the Times will remember reading a short time ago a telegraph item from Athens, Ga., in which it was related that Wm. Haguwood, while profaning and declaring that there was neither God, heaven, nor hell, was struck dumb, and that great excitement prevailed throughout that community. E. R. Mohler, with Harrison & Smith, of this city, had enough interest in the matter to write a letter to the postmaster at Athens, Ga., and in reply received the following letter: "Dear Sir: No truth in the sensational features of the matter. Mr. Haguwood is diseased and subject to attacks of partial paralysis, always losing his power of speech under excitement. He did not blaspheme. Respectfully, James Farrel, postmaster." This letter will be interesting to many people.

I will follow up every such fake story that is sent to any of our papers here and have the truth known. Of course the senders of such a tale have an excuse, for Paul lied for the glory of God, and they have to in order to keep his glory before the people. Minneapolis is a fine city full of business on Sunday, and has many Freethinkers. You can see the streets undergoing repair, and even buildings being erected, on Sunday; you can buy anything you wish, and see all kinds of sport, and the city is in its bloom. We are just through with a great carnival and fair week. Any Christian can have an argument through our papers, and our city editor on the Times will help the Liberal out if he needs any help.

Yours for truth, E. R. MOHLER.

The Book Agent in a New Role.

NEW YORK, N. Y., Sept. 23, 1895.
MR. EDITOR: I am afflicted with intermittent mental exertions other than those pertaining strictly to bread and butter, and here is a set of them:

Sunday, September 22d, I was visited by some friends. A portion of the entertainment consisted of a miniature Freethought campaign conducted by myself. It was precipitated by exhibiting "Four Hundred Years of Freethought." A lady sat down by me and I proceeded as if canvassing to sell her a copy of the book. Others were listening, and finally the "book agent's" flow of words was such that the lady arose, walked away, and refused to return, but, upon invitation by another party, the "agent" continued, and soon the canvasser began to warm the ideas of the other party also. By this time the lady had returned and began asserting as true various things only imagined by herself. She is very confident the Lord watches over her and everybody else, and told the following as her reason for so believing: One time she was sick and in much pain. A baby boy of hers "knelt down by the side of the bed and made one of the sweetest little prayers ever heard." Immediately her pain left and she went to sleep. She knows the pain left because that little boy asked the Lord to drive it away.

We sat down to dinner and neither discussion nor excitement had subsided. After a few moments one of the party remarked that she was hungry before sitting down at the table, but that the talking had taken away her appetite. Then said I, "To be consistent with the prayer story, the Lord must have taken the appetite away," but I explained it as follows: The words of the child and the thoughts relating to the child had distracted the attention of the mother from her pains, and being wearied, she dropped asleep. For, had the child prayed silently any length of time, unbeknown to the patient, there would have been no cessation of pain from that cause. Just so the mind of the hungry lady was distracted from her appetite by the discussion, and she was temporarily unconscious of the sensation of hunger. The one who believes in the prayer cure refused to admit that if the "Lord" took away her pain, he also took away the hunger. However, the cases are exactly parallel, and if the Lord had anything to do with the bodily pain he likewise took pity on the stomach.

I told the lady that, with her belief, if she were out in Denver, Col., now, she would be camping out at night to get in line next morning and be favorably affected for any malady by touching the Messiah who is doing miracles among the ignorant and superstitious. She knew better than that, however; but let that Messiah be endorsed by one preacher, and she would undoubtedly believe in all that he is reported as doing.

Through my influence, she had read a little in Paine's "Age of Reason," and said her opinions of Paine had been favorably changed.

I conduct private campaigns with individuals, often three hours at a time, and am surprised at the tenacity with which they hug a fraudulent idea. Ingersoll says he sometimes thinks there is nothing quite so powerful in this world as a lie. To some extent I believe in the doctrine of election. The elect are the ones who can be helped and think their way through and beyond the mists of mere guess-work to the solid basis of what we do know. If we do not know a thing, it is a fact that we do not know it. Asserting a guess or a lie to be true does not alter the status of the lie nor humiliate the truth, as truth, when revealed.

After worshipping the cool breezes and natural scenery in the woods at Fordham, the party disbanded for the day without an added subscription for "Four Hundred Years." However, fair warning; truth and book agents are persistent.

L. D. CRINE.

A Grave Misapprehension of Principles and Facts.

SPRINGFIELD, ILL., Sept. 15, 1895.
MR. EDITOR: I want every reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER to hunt up his copy of Sept. 7, 1895, and turn to the department of "Letters of Friends" and read an editorial comment on my letter published therein, and note what you say in reply to my reference to "alliance" of church and state. I want every reader to note the line in italic letters, to wit: "Every day growing closer." This phrase follows the statement: "It is the truth that there is an alliance," and comes between that statement and what follows: "Between the Christian church and Uncle Sam." So there is no mistaking the editorial comment to mean that there is an alliance between the Christian church and the state, and that it is "growing closer" each day.

Now, I desire to submit to you, Mr. Editor, and to all the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, the proposition that if this statement is true, there is certainly not much hope for the Liberal thinkers of this government. The outlook for our government ever being controlled by Liberal thought is certainly very discouraging. The phrase: "Every day growing closer," means progression—going forward. It means, of a certain condition now existing, that such condition is becoming stronger, more powerful, and more fully each day meeting the wishes and desires of those advocating and responsible for such condition; which means that all the work that has been done and is being done along the lines of Freethought amounts to nothing; that the labors of Freethought journals, lecturers, and teachers count for naught. It means that THE TRUTH SEEKER, which has labored so long and earnestly in the field of Freethought, had better "shut up shop," as its labors don't count; the alliance between church is "every day growing closer." The labors, the works, the teaching of Thomas Paine, have been in vain. The scientific writers, Voltaire, Haeckel, Bacon, Renan, Draper, Comte, Darwin, and Huxley have wasted their life's energies; although they are extensively read by thousands of people of this republic, the alliance between church and state goes right on "every day growing closer." The splendid work of our most eloquent exponent of Freethought, Col. R. G. Ingersoll, is "love's labor lost." It cannot count, if the alliance is "growing stronger" every day.

Now, friend Macdonald, I had made up my mind that any man who possessed the courage of his convictions sufficient to labor along year after year, in the face of vast opposition, and publish a Freethought journal, as you have been doing for several years, must certainly be a philosopher. And you may be, and the above statement may be credited to a "slip of the pen." We surely cannot credit such statement as the one herein referred to, to the sober, deliberate judgment of a philosopher. Such statement, adhered to, means that the author of it does not believe in the eternal law of progress and development; that the author does not believe in the eternal, inexorable law of mental evolution; that the author does not believe in the influence, work, and effect of all the labors of the Freethinkers of this republic. Compare conditions of government to-day with the conditions of government under our laws a century ago. Compare, then say the church is still "growing closer every day" in alliance with the state? Facts, absolute facts, show that the state is rapidly getting out of the clutches of the church. Compare the conditions, and you will plainly see that the church doesn't have the influence to-day that it once had in the formative processes of legislation. The true philosopher must admit that all honest human effort counts for something. There is a vast amount of human effort expended for Freethought in these modern times. The "rank and file" of our citizenship are receiving education on the subject, and in turn they are also aiding in spreading the gospel of Freethought, honor, and truth. Does not all this count for something? If it does, then the alliance between church and state cannot be "growing closer every day," for it is a counteractive force, to destroy the force of efforts made by creed believers to bring the church and state closer together. Our republic is a very creditable concern, for its age and the chance it has had. And it is getting better. Its alliance with the church is growing wider and weaker "every day" instead of closer.

Very truly, H. CLAY WILSON.

[We are certainly much more surprised by Mr. Wilson's letter than he possibly could have been by our comment on his former one. Why, will be seen by what follows. First, as to general propositions: The phrases, "eternal law of progress and development" and "the eternal, inexorable law of mental evolution," are all very well as slogans, but, like most other slogans, they need to be interpreted by scientific observation and common sense. Evolution is simply change, and it may be retrogression as well as progression, from the human view-point, which is the only one we have. Evolution necessarily includes involution. Decay is the complement of growth. All organisms, from the simplest to the most complex, from the tiniest to the largest, have their periods of growth, of maturity, and of decay, and then comes death, that is, dissolution. As to the "inexorable law of mental evolution" in the case of individual man, let the senility of old age furnish the comment. As to the "eternal law of progress and development" in the evolution of worlds and systems of worlds, read the testimony of the astronomers.

But even if it were admitted, to save time in argument, that the general direction of cosmical change is forward, that the latest sun or planet launched in space is an advance upon its predecessor; even if it were admitted, for the same reason, that the leading races and nations of today are in advance of the leading races and nations of the past, that our civilization is, on the whole, better than that of any previous period—even if all this were admitted, the question at issue is not affected, for we cannot blink the fact that races and nations, like the individuals composing them, rise to power, flourish for a time, sink into decrepitude, and are ultimately extinguished. Where is the Egyptian civilization? Where is the old Greece and the old Rome? What is Spain now measured by what she was? And yet their H. Clay Wilsons, in those nations' days of plenitude of power and glory, could have answered those who pointed out the dangers of the time in the same words that our H. Clay Wilson answers THE TRUTH SEEKER. Progress may be eternal, measured by eternity; but it is not when measured by time. If it is, why is the China of to-day the China of thousands of years ago? Even if it were true that a nation once great will be great at the end of time, which of course no sane person can seriously contend, it would not follow that it will be great in all the intermediate centuries and eons. There are eddies and by-currents and floods and low tides in the current of history, and it is only by ignoring these and the fundamental fact that evolution includes involution that Mr. Wilson is enabled to place his trust in the abstractions he mentions with so much positiveness.

Granting, again, to save time, that the tendency of evolution in human society is continually and steadily onward, it is still to be remembered that that progress is the result, largely, of human intelligence and prevision, and not the fruit of the operation of blind "law" independent of the exertions of men. The recognition of this fact is all-important in reform work. Evils are to be eliminated, not by sitting down and waiting for "evolution" and the "eternal law of progression," but by applying our knowledge to the removal of the predisposing conditions. As Herbert Spencer says:

It would be absurd to expect that inorganic evolution would continue if molecules ceased to attract or combine, and it would be absurd to suppose that organic evolution would continue if the instincts and appetites of individuals of each species were wholly or even partially suspended. No less absurd is it to expect that social evolution will go on apart from the normal activities, bodily and mental, of the component individuals—apart from their desires and sentiments, and those actions which they prompt.

Our conviction that the union of church and state is each day growing closer on the Western continent by no means implies that the work of Paine, and the scientific teachers, and Ingersoll, and THE TRUTH SEEKER, and all the other Free-thought workers, "amounts to nothing." Such a conclusion would be nothing less than absurd. Much good seed has been sown, but not enough; much of it has sprouted and is growing, but not enough. On the other hand, the Christian sowers have not been idle; where we have sown much they have sown more. They had a long established organization with millions of adherents to begin with; we had no organization and but a few scattered soldiers of liberty. We have recruited from their active corps and from the great indifferent reserve. They are learning better each day how to transform those indifferents into active fighters. This explains why the church and state are each year growing closer together. The very fact upon which uncritical Liberals build the airy fabric of their hopes—the decay of the old doctrinal creeds—is the source of our present danger. By ceasing to insist on belief in the devil and in hell the churches, but more especially their political auxiliary societies, are gathering their millions of recruits. A certain proportion of these recruits are voters and they are the menace of the politician; he is afraid of them, and through that fear he gives them the repressive laws they want. What men will do at the polls for so-called "moral" reforms—chief of which is Sabbath observance—is becoming more and more the test of admission to the church, rather than what they believe about abstract theological dogmas. The Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor has millions of members, a large proportion of them the sons and daughters of parents who are not church members, some of them the children of Freethinkers. They stand solidly for the church in legislation. The same is true of many other lay organizations, some composed of young people, some of adults. To ignore these facts would be fatal to safety. The church is beaten in the field of science and criticism, but this by no means implies that she has relinquished her desire and intention to rule mankind or that all danger from that source is over in this country. On the contrary, a great and desperate struggle is right before us, yea, we are in the beginning of it now. It is no time for blowing rose-perfumed soap-bubbles.

If Mr. Wilson thinks that to recognize danger and to affirm that at this time the church is regaining through politics something of what she lost in the arena of debate, is to say that all the labors of the Freethinkers of the past and present have gone for naught, how will he deal with the fact that in Belgium, where the Freethinkers are splendidly organized and wide-awake, the Catholic church, by means of the new plural ballot law, is in the saddle and will not stop until she has made religious instruction a part of the curriculum of the public schools? Does the fact that Catholicism is now dominant there in the halls of legislation prove that the scientific men and Freethinkers of Belgium and of the world have taught and suffered in vain? It now seems probable that Mexico is to accept a papal delegate officially credited to her government, and it is certain that the church is in a much better situation there than she was twenty years ago. Did, then, Juarez and his compatriots spend treasure and blood and life for nothing? Have the Freethinkers of Canada been wasting their energies because THE TRUTH SEEKER is now shut out of the mails of that country by a narrow-minded official acting under a despotic law? In a word, does the success of the church, here or elsewhere, through the plural ballots of priests or the votes of the ignorant and superstitious masses, constitute a valid denial of the benefits of the campaign of education we have so long been conducting? Who supposed that we had educated the bulk of the people into acceptance of the principles of Freethought and Secularism or that the church could not frighten lawmakers into her service if she chose to transfer the fight against mental liberty from the pulpit to the ballot-box? Well, she has chosen so to do.

The union between church and state is every day growing closer and closer. The aggregate evidence of the facts is against Mr. Wilson. There have been, of course, little gains for us here and there in the political field, but they are no more than eddies in the strong current setting the other way. We hope for a turn in the current and are doing all we can to produce it, but we cannot shut our eyes to the plain fact that we are now on the defensive. Church property is still exempt from taxation, and during recent years the property of such bodies as the Young Men's Christian Association has been frequently exempted by special acts or general legislation. The Bible has been put out of some schools, but has gone into others, and at best the fight here is a drawn one. Jefferson refused to appoint a day of prayer, but no president since has declined to do so, and the governors all defer to the church in this particular. Chaplains are in all public institutions, and even political conventions are opened with prayers, while some parties incorporate recognitions of Christian and Theistic dogmas in their platforms. We have heard during the past year of several courts of justice where the sessions are opened with prayer, including at least one of the Maine courts. The latest report of this kind to reach us is from Scottsboro, Ala., where Circuit Judge Bilbro has adopted the practice of opening his court every morning with a short lesson read from the Bible, and prayer. The Scottsboro Age says that it is an innovation in that part of the country, but it regards it as "a beautiful and important practice," and hopes it will very soon be adopted in every county in the state. We should think that this was bringing the church right into the holy of holies of the state, but lest Mr. Wilson should dissent we will say no more.

Would-be citizens have been denied naturalization because they did not believe in the Christian fetish-book. Here is a dispatch appearing in the New York World of September 21st, this year:

John Zing, eighty years old, of Union Hill, went to the Court-House in Jersey City yesterday to be made a citizen. Constable Wise brought him before Judge Hoffman.

After asking the necessary questions the court told Zing to put his hand on the Bible in order to swear allegiance to the Constitution of the United States.

Zing refused to touch the book and Judge Hoffman promptly declined to make him a citizen.

But the church is making her most determined attacks on the liberty of the press and the freedom of the citizen on her Sabbath. As all our readers now know, THE TRUTH SEEKER has just been denied second-class mail privileges in Canada. For years there has been a persistent and strongly-supported attempt to get through Congress a bill that would put the same arbitrary power of exclusion into the hands of our postmaster-general that the Canadian Post-office act gives the postmaster-general of that country. Existing postal legislation in this country, secured by the devoted henchmen of the church, has already grievously oppressed such earnest Freethought workers as D. M. Bennett and Dr. Foote. In New York, in Detroit, in Richmond, and hundreds of other places, the old Sabbath laws have been rigorously enforced during the past year; in hundreds of other places more stringent ordinances have been adopted or laws enacted where there had never before been legal recognition of the Sabbath—this is particularly true in California; four states, California, Illinois, Missouri, and New York, have closed barber-shops on Sunday, while Massachusetts has passed a law against Sunday amusements which fines even the spectators and excepts nothing but "sacred concerts" or other entertainments under religious auspices. The quoted and italicized words are all the comments that that law needs. Toronto was once very much like other cities where the Puritans had not taken control of things, but some years ago a crusade was started, directly under religious impulse and guidance, and it was not long before it became the typical blue-law city of the continent, where not even the parks were open and the street cars could not run. West of here because there is not the space to spare for the continuation of this enumeration of the evidences that the union of church and state in this country is every year growing closer and closer. Our files contain much of this evidence, but only a part of what was available. One more extremely significant fact should be mentioned, one that is no doubt well known to Lawyer Wilson, and that is that during the past few years several state supreme courts have passed upon the validity of Sabbath laws, and they have, without exception, to the best of our knowledge, sustained such laws. If Mr. Wilson knows of a case to the contrary he will confer a favor by citing it in these columns. Having the legislators in a panic over the fear of antagonizing the millions of auxiliary Christians and the regulars, and also having the courts uniformly with them, is there any wonder that the more aggressive threaten to suppress THE TRUTH SEEKER by enforcing the old or securing the enactment of new "blasphemy" laws?—ED. T. S.]

NEW BOOKS

BY

ROBT G. INGERSOLL

The Field-Ingersoll Discussion. Price, paper, 25 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

In 1888 the Rev. Dr. Henry M. Field wrote an open letter to Colonel Ingersoll, with the intent to convert him. The letter was published in the North American Review, and was replied to by the person addressed. All our older readers know the value of this discussion. To those who do not remember it we can only say that they should lose no time in procuring a copy if they want a controversial treat.

The Ingersoll-Gladstone Controversy about Christianity. Price, paper, 25 cts; cloth, 50 cts.

When the Field-Ingersoll Controversy closed in the North American Review the Christians felt that their champion had been very badly worsted in argument, and the publishers of the Review engaged the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone to attempt to rehabilitate the Presbyterian creed. He wrote a long letter to Colonel Ingersoll, to which the latter replied at length and, it is generally agreed, completely demolished the greatest controversialist Christianity can produce. These letters are now for the first time available in pamphlet form.

Myth and Miracle. Price, 25c.

This is one of Colonel Ingersoll's best lectures, but never before put into print. Everyone who has heard it will most certainly want it, and those who have not heard it will have a rare treat in its perusal, as something new from the Colonel, which also is something that everybody is looking for.

Which Way? Price, 25 cents.

This lecture is a consideration of the difference between the natural and the supernatural, and some reasons why the former is the best way to go. Perhaps no one of Colonel Ingersoll's orations has won more general applause from enlightened audiences than this. It contains that most magnificent of perorations, his visions—"This was. This is. This shall be." The lecture was never before printed in pamphlet form. It is splendid. Send for it.

The Truth Seeker,

28 LAFAYETTE PLACE, New York.

WITH DAUGHTER'S BABE UPON HIS KNEES.

A new edition of that splendid prose poem "Life," by the prince of orators, Col. R. G. Ingersoll. It is larger and better than the old edition, and can be framed or placed upon the table as an ornament. In the center of the card appear the portraits of the Colonel and the baby, surrounded by the prose poem, which has been truthfully described as, "one of the masterpieces of the orator and poet, who now, as far as we know, stands alone in the living world." It will make a delightful present, and will be a souvenir not only of intellectual greatness, but of artistic workmanship. It is printed on heavy board, gilt boveled edge. The size is 12x16 inches, and the price only 75 cents, post-paid.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

A Chestnut in a New Burr.

A roaming Scot, once on a day,
Stood by Niagara's tide,
And watched the surges leap and play,
The boiling rapids glide.

To him advanced, with pompous mien,
A pert and vauntful wight;
Said: "Sir, I'm sure you've never seen
In Scotland such a sight."

Now him the Scot disdainful eyed—"Hoots! yes, and muckle mair;
E'en but twa miles from whaur I bide
There's something far more rare."

"And what may that be, sir, I beg!"
In somewhat of surprise.

"A peacock wi' a timmer' leg!"
Our pawky Scot replies,

Don't.

"I'm tired of 'don'ts,'" said Margaret B.
"Just as tired of 'don'ts' as I can be,
For its 'don't' do this, and don't' do that,
'Don't' worry the dog, 'don't' scare the cat,
'Don't' be untidy, and 'don't' be vain,
'Don't' interrupt, 'don't' do it again,
'Don't' bite your nails, 'don't' gobble your food,
'Don't' speak so loud, it's dreadfully rude,
'Don't' mumble your words, 'don't' say 'I won't,'
Oh! all day long it's nothing but don't!
Some time or other I hope—don't' you?
Some one or other will say, 'Please do!'"

Some Popular Errors About Snakes.

EDITOR CHILDREN'S CORNER: Having some knowledge concerning snakes that I have never seen in print, I have concluded to make use of this rainy day to enlighten the readers of the Children's Corner, or, at least, let them know what that knowledge is.

Our horror of snakes is inherited from our prehistoric ancestors, who, doubtless, had more trouble with them than any of their descendants.

Snakes must have been primitive man's most formidable and destructive foe. The large ones laid in wait to swallow him, and the small ones bit and poisoned him when hiding from beasts of prey and the carnivorous monsters of the period. Hence our horror. Originally, in the United States, the rattlesnake was the most poisonous and more numerous than any other kind. In the thin and unsettled parts this is still the case. But the rattler disappears before the white man, and the white man is not sorry. The king, and large chicken snakes, are said to be his untiring and destructive foes, but, some how, when the white man does not help to exterminate him, the rattler is the most numerous, but after the settlers come the chicken snake is ten times as numerous as the rattler. Consequently I suspect that the stories about king and chicken snakes being the rattlesnake's deadly and victorious foes are the offspring of wishes rather than of facts. I will confine myself to what I have seen rather than to what I have heard.

The most common error stated in books, newspapers, magazines, and by people innumerable, who ought to know better, is that rattlesnakes, prairie dogs, and screech owls live happily and peacefully together in one hole or dwelling. Nothing is further from the truth. They all live in holes in one "dog town," but I know, for a certainty, that prairie dogs don't knowingly "visit with" a "rattler." The rattler, it is true, likes to be sociable, and have the dogs "call around and stay to dinner," but if any dog calls, he is never permitted "to go back to his folks;" the rattler "loves him so well that he could just eat him," which he literally and emphatically does at every opportunity.

Another error is that snakes charm or mesmerize their prey. I have seen this stated in books big enough to tell the truth, but it is not so, just the same.

The facts are, poisonous snakes are less agile than non-poisonous. The rattler is comparatively clumsy, and with the exception that he can strike one-third of his length with great swiftness, is otherwise slow compared to garter snakes, king snakes, and chicken snakes, cats, mice, rats, rabbits, etc. So he lies in wait and strikes his prey with his fangs, which renders his victim so crazy with paralyzing pains that it does not know what to do; meanwhile the rattler, with head erect and hideous, greedy-looking countenance, moves around excitedly until his agonized victim comes again in striking distance, when it is either seized or struck the second time, and that is all there is to the charming or mesmerizing theory.

Once, on the Staked Plains in Texas, I saw a rattlesnake glide up to an occupied prairie-dog hole. No dogs appeared for a long time, but in about thirty minutes a half-grown dog's head appeared at the top or rim of the hole. Instantly the snake struck at him, and the dog disappeared down the hole. I thought the snake had missed him, but in half a minute the dog emerged again; meanwhile the snake had been excitedly moving around the hole, and was not able to hit the dog as it rushed out. The dog, who was about the size of a house rat, ran around apparently in fearful agony, until it again came near the excited snake, which struck it the second time with his fangs and knocked it over. Strange to say, the snake did not seize it, but took a station near the dog hole, until the little fellow fell helpless; then the snake seized it. I could not watch the snake any longer, although much I wished to, as my horses had started with the wagon, and I had a long, hard run to catch them. I have often wondered why the snake did not seize the dog when he bit it the second time. It must have been that the snake knew the dog had teeth which, in its fright and agony, it would be apt to use if held fast. Mr. S. S. Bowman, near Childress, Tex., a very intelligent man, had the same views I had about rattlesnakes, prairie dogs, and screech owls, and called my attention to the fact that prairie dogs frequently bury a rattlesnake in one of their holes. They doubtless shut him off from getting down to their living rooms by closing the hole below him with packed dirt, a thing they can do nicely, and then close the top on him, which accounts for holes that look as if they had caved in or been spaded till the hole was closed. So we can see that even a "rattler," with the best location for his business in a prairie dog town, will sometimes make a "failure in life." H. G.

Correspondence.

ON BOARD U. S. MONITOR AMPHITRITE,
U. S. NAVY YARD, NORFOLK, VA.,
Sept. 24, 1895.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I know you will surmise, as well as some of the readers, what is the matter with me, and probably you will think that I have eloped to parts unknown; but such is not the case. I had intended to write to the Corner ere this, but I just kept putting it off until now, but I guess you will pardon me for being so neglectful, as I shall try to be more prompt in the future. We have not been much molested this summer with our cousins, the musketos, but when we were cruising around the Southern waters this summer we were nearly distracted with the sand-flies, which, instead of stinging like a musketo, take a piece of flesh in the bargain. Well, what do you think they did? One hot and sultry night, while we were at anchor in the harbor of Brunswick, Ga., they came in a whole drove and carried off the quarter-deck awning, and the next night returned with canvas overalls, which they made out of the awning.

I was home on a furlough the first of the month, and enjoyed myself immensely. I will have to remain in the service for four years yet, as I am now only seventeen. I will be glad to hear from any of the readers.

With best wishes I remain as ever your devoted friend,
CHAS. W. POWER.

[We did not know we had a sailor boy belonging to the Corner. We see he has learned how to spin yarns sailor fashion. Tell us a story of the sea, Charles.—Ed. C. C.]

SHERMAN, MICH., Sept. 10, 1895.

MY DEAR MISS WIXON: Probably you have entirely forgotten me, but I hope you will grant me a little space in your Corner once more; and perhaps when you see my name will remember having received letters from me before.

It has been about two years since I wrote you last, and I have changed my occupation slightly since then, in so much that now I'm teaching instead of attending school. I have taught four months in a district two-and-a-half miles from home. I board at home, and walk to and from my school. Don't you think I ought to be healthy? Well, I am; haven't been real sick since I began teaching.

I am celebrating a short vacation at present. Not in the prescribed manner of going to a resort, however. No. I am flourishing the dish-cloth, sewing carpet rags, daubing paint, driving horses, cooking, reading, etc. If you live on a farm you can readily understand what "etc." means. For amusement I attend church, dances, prayer-meetings, and baptisms.

Next Monday I expect to begin another four-months' term in the same district. A minister who lives next door to us loaned me a book a week ago, telling me to be sure to read it. It is "A City Without a Church," by Henry Drummond. I have read about twenty pages, and find some new ideas, but cannot say I am in love with the book.

Quite a revival of religion has struck this community, and I fear it has injured some quite badly. Two of my brightest pupils have been "carried away," as it were, by the prayer-meetings which have been a result of the revival. Several attempts have been made to "save" my soul, but they have been unsuccessful, and I have been given up as a bad sinner.

Now I know you have enough of my chatter, so with a few inquiries I will close. What has become of Inez E. Plumb? Friend, if you still live, answer my last letter.

I would like another correspondent—someone who is a great talker like myself, but who I hope can say more in fewer words. Hoping I have not wearied you, Miss Wixon, I remain, yours for freedom of thought and speech,

AURA SOUTHWICK.

P.S.—Miss Wixon, I enjoyed ever so much your answer to that most worthy lady who thought it her duty to point out the straight and narrow path to you. It was splendid and right to the point.

M. H. S.

[Very glad to hear from you again, and to know that you are engaged in valuable and interesting work. Teaching school is one of the most honorable employments, and to know how to do other kinds of work is a great advantage. Revivals are a mild form of insanity that wears off after awhile, sometimes, however, bearing bad results. Sorry one has struck your town.—Ed. C. C.]

"No Beginning, or the Fundamental Fallacy," is the title of a book issued by our old friend and schoolmate, Hon. Wm. H. Maple, of Chicago. After a careful reading of it we are compelled to say that it is one of the clearest, most logical and convincing productions upon the question of the beginning of creation we have ever read. Mr. Maple is a scholar and a logician, and has studied the cause and effect of things to the bottom. Every real thinker and student should read the work, as it is a lesson in common sense and philosophy worth studying.—D. M. Boker, Editor Santa Ana Standard, Cal. (Price, $1. Address THE TRUTH SEEKER.)

THE New constitution of South Carolina will disfranchise all illiterate Negroes, but will not so affect illiterate whites. It will also so arrange educational concerns that the Negroes will not be educated in the future, thus tending to reduce the numbers of those who will be able to vote.

LATER experiments seem to show that the Krag-Jorgensen rifle, adopted by the war department at an expense of more than $300,000 and of which 25,000 have been made at the Springfield armory, will have to be abandoned, as it becomes too hot to handle after a few shots and cannot be depended upon for accuracy for a distance of more than 300 yards.

THE Labor Exchange, with headquarters at Olathe, Kans., is spreading quite rapidly in the West. It is intended to employ the idle who wish to work; the payment for services or products is in the form of a labor certificate, good for any products deposited with the local Exchange, or, by means of the Exchange clearing house, with other branches.

THE Hungarian Reichstag has finally passed the remaining Church reform bills, including the removal of all hitherto existing Hebrew disabilities. The civil marriage law became effective October 1st. The first bride under the new law will be the daughter of Deputy Mezei, and many coming marriages, both of Hebrews and Christians, have been announced throughout the provinces. The churches have been busy during the last few days with weddings of devout Catholics under the old law.

THE BRAIN AND BIBLE; OR THE CONFLICT BETWEEN MENTAL SCIENCE AND THEOLOGY.

By EDGAR C. BEALL, M.D.,

with a preface by

R. G. INGERSOLL.

This is the only work of its kind in the literature of Freethought. Its arguments are based upon scientific phrenology, and appeal directly to the reader's sense of logic and love of justice. It is eloquent as well as convincing.

SOME PRESS COMMENTS:

We have read some of the passages of the commentary prepared for the "Woman's Bible" by that very accomplished American woman and Biblical student, Mrs. Elizabeth Cady Stanton. They are a great deal more satisfactory than many of the comments upon the same texts that we have read in other and more pretentious commentaries. Mrs. Stanton's interpretative remarks are often shrewd and sensible. —[Editorial New York "Sun."]

If the Revision Committee continue this style of exegesis, we venture to predict that there will be sensations in the religious world such as no mere man of our time, no Cummings, nor Colenso, nor Beecher, nor Briggs, has been able to arouse. —[N. Y. "Press."]

The chapter published from the advance sheets of the "Woman's Bible" last week very naturally created a widespread sensation. The "Woman's Bible" promises to be an important contribution to the literature of Holy Writ. —[N. Y. "Recorder."]

The announcement that the proposed "Woman's Bible" will soon be published has stirred up many of the clergy. The work will be simply a commentary on certain portions of the Bible relating to the status of women. —[N. Y. "Tribune."]

An association of "up to date" women is engaged in making a new translation of the Bible. This is great news. —[Charivari, Paris, France.]

The "Woman's Bible" is a translation by a joint committee of American and English women and is the most serious labor yet undertaken by the women's rights leaders. —[Albany "Evening Journal."]

The Sisterhood of Advanced Women has decided to take a bold step toward the complete emancipation of the sex. It has long groaned under certain implications of servitude contained in a few passages of scripture, and has, therefore, determined to abolish these disabilities by publishing a "Woman's Bible." —[Pall Mall Gazette.]

The most marked step in this iconoclastic direction is the movement to publish the "Woman's Bible." It is being prepared by some of the good and advanced women of the day, who are met in their many reforms with the stubborn arguments of some of the passages of the scriptures that tend to justify low ideals. Their aim is to omit the immoral teachings of the Mosaic law and all the unwholesome passages. Expurgated editions of the poets there have been, but it remains for the ingenious new woman to devise an expurgated edition of the Bible. —[Minneapolis "Times."]

The new "Woman's Bible" is one of the remarkable productions of the century. —[Denver "News."]

The theological world of Chicago is thoroughly stirred by the announcement, published in the Times-Herald this morning, that Elizabeth Cady Stanton and nearly a score of collaborators in the persons of distinguished women, will undertake a revision of those portions of the scriptures dealing directly or indirectly with the relative positions of man and woman, and will publish the result of their labors in a new Bible, which is to be known as "The Woman's Bible." —[Chicago "Post."]

EVERY Woman Ought to Read It. Every LIBERAL Woman and Man Will Want It.

WOMAN, CHURCH, AND STATE.

By Matilda Joslyn Gage.

This is Mrs. Gage's latest and crowning work. It is THE book to show how the church has enslaved woman and kept and keeps her in an inferior position. A glance at its contents will show this:

The first chapter—the Matriarchate—shows that under the old civilizations woman had great freedom, but that the tendency of Christianity from the first was to restrict her liberty. In this chapter Mrs. Gage claims that to the Matriarchate—or Mother-rule—the world is indebted for its first conception of inherent rights.

Chapter II deals with the theological dogmas of original sin and celibacy. Woman, by the church, was not regarded as a human being; marriage was looked upon as vile; wives were sold as slaves; women driven to suicide; the influence of the church was unfavorable to virtue. The celibacy of the clergy produced degrading sensuality, and woman was the victim of these brutes.

Chapter III is on The Canon Law, showing how the church controlled woman by making the legitimacy of marriage depend upon its own control of the ceremony. Ancient civilization gave place to Christian barbarism, the clergy became a distinct body—at once a "holy" and an unholy caste. Learning was prohibited to women, husbands prohibited from leaving them more than one-third of their property; daughters could be disinherited, sons could not. The Reformation effected no change.

Chapter IV—Marquette—is on Feudalism and its degradation of women, the rights of "lords spiritual," the immorality of the heads of the church, baptism of nude women in the early Christian church. It also deals with some of the later-day abuses of females, like our Northwestern pineries, the English debaucheries, governmental crime-makers, etc.

Chapter V—Witchcraft. In the days of this phase of religious insanity Mrs. Gage shows how the possession of even a little learning was sufficient cause to suspect a woman of witchcraft, that to keep a pet was dangerous, so rabid were the clergy not to suffer a witch to live. This persecution for witchcraft was a continuance of the church's policy for obtaining universal dominion over mankind. Women physicians of the Middle Ages were persecuted, and the "Pilgrim Fathers" continued it in America. The first synod convened in America was to try a woman for heresy, and others were stripped and whipped for not agreeing with the clergy.

The chapter on "Wives" shows how the disruption of the Roman empire was unfavorable to the personal and proprietary rights of woman—that the sale of daughters was practiced in England seven hundred years after it was Christianized—that the practice of buying wives was regulated by law—that women were not permitted to read the Bible—that they were not admitted as witnesses—that civil marriage is opposed by the church.

In Chapter VII is shown how polygamy was sustained by the Christian church, that the first synod of the Reformation convened to sanction this institution, that Luther and the other "principal reformers" favored it, as well as the American Board of Foreign Missions. The Mormon theocracy is shown to be similar to that of other Christian sects.

In the last three chapters Mrs. Gage treats of the opposition of the church to the amelioration of woman's sufferings as interference with her "curse," of woman's degradation by the church to laborer unit for slaves, of woman's "inferiority," as taught by the church to-day, and of how little value Christianity has been and is to civilization.

The work is a burning protest against the tremendous wrong done woman by the church, which controlled the state. It is also extremely valuable as history. No woman, it seems to us, can read it and remain a supporter of the religious institution which has crushed her individuality, her mentality, and degraded her person. To the woman's cause it opens an Age of Reason. It ought to be widely read for the good it will do.

Not for Parsons.

"JOHNNIE, why did not the lions eat Daniel?" "Cause they didn't know he was so good."

LITTLE GIRL (in church): "Why does so many people put those little envelopes on th' contribution plate?" Little Boy: "Them's to keep the pennies from makin' so much noise."—New York Weekly.

MAMMA (to little girl of four who has been naughty): "You wicked girl! You know if I cannot see you some one can." Little Girl: "Who can, then?" Mamma: "God can." Little Girl: "Where is he, then? I can't see him. You know I'll have no peeping."

"TILL He Come"—meanwhile the earth is sufficient for the elect. Not many years since an archbishop lay dying. Said a sympathetic prelate, "Brother, do you wish to arrange for hereafter?" "Damn 'Hereafter.' York's quite good enough for me." This was related to the writer by one whom that self-same archbishop ordained as curate in the Church of England.—Literary Guide.

"Now, as announced," began the good man, "I shall proceed to give thirteen reasons why riding the bicycle has a tendency to send the soul as straight to perdition as a bee goeth to a buckwheat patch." (Profound silence.) "And now, thirteenthly, the wheel has a tendency to divert interest in the preached word; to lure to distant and frivolous paths; to drag the earnest soul to the outside world. If this is not the case, will some brother or sister deny it? I challenge ye to controvert this unwelcome truth. I pause for a reply from the congregation"—(There was no reply! There was no congregation! It was off on its wheel!)—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

In Germany, some malcontents are circulating scriptural texts, such as the following: "It is better to trust in the Lord than to put confidence in princes" (Psalm cxviii, 9). "Put ye not confidence in a ruler" (Micah vii, 5). "Put not your trust in princes" (Psalm cxlvi, 3). "Woe to thee, O land, when thy king is a child" (Eccles. x, 16). "That which is highly esteemed among men is abomination in the sight of God" (Luke xvi, 15). "Go to now, ye rich men, weep and howl for your miseries that shall come upon you" (James v, 1). The purpose of the malcontents is to show that, if all anti-revolutionary literature is prohibited, the emperor will have to interdict the Bible.—London Freethinker.

A WISCONSIN minister, says The Christian Register, distributes through the community where he lives the following startling and, to a reverent mind, irreverent and ghastly announcement:

THEATER!

By command of King of kings, and at the desire of all who love his appearing, at the Theater of the Universe, on the Eve of Time, will be performed the GREAT ASSIZE, OR DAY OF JUDGMENT.

The scenery, which is now actually being prepared, will not only surpass anything that has yet been seen, but will infinitely exceed the utmost stretch of human conception. There will be a just representation of all the inhabitants of the world in their various and proper colors; and their customs and manners will be so exactly and so minutely delineated that the most secret thoughts will be discovered.

This theater will be laid out after a new plan, and will consist of pit and gallery only; and, contrary to all others, the gallery is fitted up for the reception of people of high (or heavenly) birth, and the pit for those of low (or earthly) rank.

N. B.—The gallery is very spacious, and the pit without bottom.

PRINCIPAL PERFORMERS.

Judge.....The Son of God
Jurymen.....The Saints of the Most High
Drunkards, Swearers, Sabbath-Breakers, Extortioners, Lovers of Sinful Pleasures, Fornicators, the Fearful and Unbelieving, and Whosoever loveth and maketh a Lie.
Prisoners.....Angels, Ministers, Conscience, and Word of God.
Witnesses.....Abaddon
Jailer.....Ministers of Vengeance. Angels of Bottomless Pit

Tickets for the pit are sold at every place of Temptation, where the lust of the flesh and the lust of the eyes and the pride of life are displayed.

Tickets for the gallery may be had gratis at the "fountain open for sin and uncleanness," but will only be given to those who are willing to deny all ungodliness, and take up the cross daily, forsake all unrighteousness, and follow Christ.

Tickets not transferable. No money will be taken at the door, and all who are admitted into the galleries must be sprinkled with the blood of Christ, and sealed with Immanuel's signet.

INGERSOLL AND JESUS. Showing how the two agree. A poem by Samuel P. Putnam. THE LIMITATIONS OF TOLERATION.

A discussion between Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, Hon. Frederic R. Conder, Ex-Gov. Stewart L. Woodford, before the Nineteenth Century Club of New York. "Each man has the same right to express to the whole world his ideas that the rest of the world have to express their thoughts to him." Colonel Ingersoll maintains this, the others deny it. Mr. Conder is a Roman Catholic, Mr. Woodford a Protestant.

MATERIALISM: Its History, and Its Influence Upon Society. Dr. Louis Buchner.

MIRACLES AND MIRACLE WORKERS. A Consideration of the Marvels and Miracles of the New Testament. One of John Peck's best books.

MOSES BEFORE THE COURT, or The Forgery of the Old Testament. Dedicated to the Clergy. H. J. Seignuret, M.D.

THE NEW GOD. "It is an open secret that man has always made his Gods. They exist in and through him, as the image exists in and through the mirror. Take away man and you take away God—the image vanishes." This pamphlet, therefore, is a consideration of what kind of a God man should make. Samuel P. Putnam.

ORTHODOXY. A lecture by Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll, and one of that great man's best. The subjects considered are: Orthodox Religion Dying Out, Religious Deaths and Births, The Religion of Reciprocity, Mohammed, The Destruction of Art, The Discovery of America, Copernicus and Kepler, Charles Darwin, Special Providence, The Latest Creed, God as a Governor, The Love of God, The Fall of Man, The Atonement, The Second Birth, Inspiration, The Reign of Truth and Love, The Wars It Brought, The Resurrection, The Judgment-Day, Pious Evasions, "No Bible, No Civilization," Miracles of the New Testament, The Ascension, Casting out Devils, Necessity of Belief, Eternal Punishment, Some who Are Damned, What I Believe, Immortality.
